Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am advised that some of these contracts are for five years, some for three years, and some have but one year to run, I understand. I am not clear whether there is such a provision in the contract as the Senator from Arkansas refers to, but by an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, agreed to in the Senate the other day, that provision was inserted in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not wish to be understood as saying that it was represented to me that the contract itself provides for six months' notice before the discharge of an instructor, but the contract is made for a definite period of time, and I presume the power of discharge from public necessity or for other cause is reserved in the contract.

I am informed that assurance was given these several instructors that the power to discharge them would not be exercised previous to the termination of their contracts except upon six months' notice, and one can readily see the reason for such an understanding. Persons who are engaged in teaching, like other persons who have employment, are under the necessity of making provision for the future, and any teacher who is discharged now will find it difficult, if not impossible, to secure employment during the coming year, for the reason that all schools which conduct their business upon a sane basis have already employed their instructors for the coming year.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is great force in what the Senator from Arkansas has stated. The Government of the United States can not afford to be ungenerous with these people and violate its contracts, either in letter or in spirit. But I am not looking at this matter so much from the standpoint of the instructor himself as from the standpoint of the academy and the standpoint of the midshipmen.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has referred to the necessity for economy. I accept his statement as correct. But it appeared in the course of the debate here that the naval officers' salaries are from 20 to 40 per cent in excess of the salaries of the civilian instructors. More than that, one of the admirals, I am advised, perhaps at the commencement exercises, very recently, anyway, made the statement that the Navy needs a thousand officers additional. The total enrollment in the Naval Academy during this past year, which was the peak year in the history of that academy, was 2,500. The total enrollment during this coming year will be something in excess of 2,400, only slightly less than it was last year, and if there is this need of naval officers, as there seems to be, let them do the work of officers, and let us maintain a reasonable proportion of these civilian instructors.

I have not only conferred with naval instructors, but I have conferred with members of the Board of Visitors, and I know that the character of instruction which is given by the civilian instructors is vastly superior to that which the students get from the naval officers, and for the very good reason that those naval officers have had little or no experience in teaching. Of course, the civilian instructors are confined to certain lines of instruction, as, for instance, mathematics, English, modern languages, and probably physics and some other kindred branches. When it comes to navigation, gunnery, and studies of that kind, certainly the practical instructor on the whole is the better, and the naval officers are used for that purpose. But the academy for some years has pursued the policy of having some of these officers take positions as civilian instructors in modern language, in English, in mathematics, in physics, and such subjects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not only is it true that in certain classes of study the civilian instructor would perhaps be better qualified to perform service than the naval officer who has had no experience in teaching, but it is also true that these civilian instructors afford the only medium of touch between the Naval Academy and the students there and civilian life.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is exactly right.

Mr. ROBINSON. That has been deemed by many students of the subject as of considerable value.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not care to continue the discussion of the character of the instruction which has been given at that academy. I went into that somewhat at length formerly. But this information coming to me as it did, when the conferees are sitting, I felt it would not be improper to call the Senate's attention to it.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I was interested in the fact that the present occupant of the chair, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] took occasion to-day to discuss the adjusted compensation situation. On yesterday, owing to a motion to lay upon the table, which had the effect of shutting off debate, we were not permitted to discuss the question of the time when the adjusted compensation measure would be considered. I regretted that incident very much.

I know the people of the country are interested in that question. The people in the State which I represent in part certainly are interested in it. It is not a new question before the Senate, as appeared from what was said on yesterday, and a hope has been held out at different times that this measure would finally be disposed of.

About a year ago, when the President of the United States came before the Senate and asked a recommittal of the measure then pending, I expressed my objection to that course. I predicted then that it meant undue delay if not ultimate defeat. Following his address, on the 15th day of July the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] gave explicit assurances that there would be no such delay as would work to the detriment of the people who would be beneficially interested in that measure. I wish to read his language. He was discussing the effect of the recommitment, and said:

> What effect, then, will its recommitment have on the status of the proposed legislation? Will it delay its enactment into law? Will it postpone the time within which in its present form the legislation would become effective? I assume, Mr. President, that these questions are now being asked by the American soldier, and I answer both questions: The recommitment will, of course, delay the date on which the compensation bill would in all probability have become a law. The recommitment, however, will not, in my opinion, postpone the time at which the legislation proposed will become effective.
> Under the terms of the bill the cash payment and the insurance plans are to come into effect as of July 1, 1922. Long before that date the bill, in its present or amended form, will be placed upon the statute books of the country.

That was a solemn assurance from the chairman of the Finance Committee, who at different times had expressed his unqualified support of the adjusted compensation legislation. The 1st of July will soon be here—in just a few days more—and I suppose no one will believe that prior to that date will the legislation become effective.

I called attention at that time to the fact that the educational provisions of the measure would largely become of no avail unless speedily enacted into law. At that time—a year ago—the average age of the ex-service men was 28 years. To-day it is a year greater. Time is going by. I am glad to know, notwithstanding what occurred yesterday, that there is still a deliberate determination on the part of those who favor the legislation to see that it shall come to early enactment. There is no telling when the tariff bill is going to be passed. Judging from present indications which I see all around me, it is going to be some time. I apprehend that the question of the adjusted compensation will not down until it is settled—until it is passed upon by the membership of this Chamber.

The Senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the Finance Committee, on yesterday undertook to give us further assurance that the bill would become a law before the expiration of this Congress. I am confident that assurance was given in all good faith. I know that the Senator from North Dakota always believes what he says. But if we may judge the future by the past, we can but have apprehension, and the Senator from North Dakota, as well as the rest of us, will be disappointed in the future as we have been in the past. That the legislation should be enacted I believe is the view of at least two-thirds of the Members of this body. Delay can only militate against it. Delay can not serve any useful purpose. We have laid aside the tariff bill for many other measures, some of them requiring several days for consideration. It is true the most important of those perhaps were appropriation bills to pay the debts of the Government, but those who believe in the adjusted compensation bill believe that it is for the purpose of paying a debt, and I can not conceive of a more sacred debt than that. If we can take up time in paying other debts, why can we not take up time to pay this debt?

Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate now in discussing the matter, but if the distinguished Senator from North Dakota feels that the people of the country are willing that the delay shall be had, I want to state that in my humble judgment he is mistaken about it. From the State of New Mexico every official connected with the ex-service men has wired me that the tariff bill should be laid aside or that the adjusted compensation bill should not be deferred because of the tariff bill. They are not different from officials in other States. They do not speak solely for themselves. They are representative people. They have the official confidence, and of course the personal confidence of the great mass of the ex-service men. It is their judgment that the matter should not be longer delayed. Delay can only operate to disadvantage. It has operated to the disadvantage of those who want to get some benefit from it. If it is a debt, let us pay it with as much freedom as we would pay any other indebtedness of the Government. Everybody else who has a claim against the United States comes here and we listen to the claimant and we are at least liberal in listening to the evidence in support of the claim. We are liberal in our appropriations. Why should we not be liberal with this kind of claim against our great Government, a claim growing out of the greatest war in the history of the world, a claim which has in its foundation the greatest service to civilization within historical times?

Mr. President, I have here telegrams from the department commander of the American Legion, the department president of the American Legion Auxiliary, the first vice president of the American Legion Auxiliary, and the department commander Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. I ask that these telegrams may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., June 18 1922.

Senator A. A. JONES,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The American Legion appreciates your unfailing devotion to the ex-service men and women of America, and we of New Mexico feel that we can absolutely count upon you to vote against sidetracking the adjusted compensation bill for the tariff bill or any other piece of legislation which is secondary to the great debt which the country owes her defenders.

M. A. OTERO, Jr.,
Department Commander the American Legion.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., June 18, 1922.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Department of New Mexico, American Legion Auxiliary, requests you vote against laying aside adjusted compensation bill to make room for tariff legislation.

MRS. BELLE NYE,
Department President American Legion Auxiliary.

CLAYTON, N. MEX., June 19, 1922.

Senator A. A. JONES,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Ladies' Auxiliary, American Legion, urge that you vote against placing tariff bill ahead of adjusted compensation measure. Tariff bill has twice been laid aside for Army and Navy bills, and we think that compensation bill should take precedence over tariff bill.

Mrs. C. F. MILLIGAN,
First Vice President American Legion Auxiliary.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., June 19, 1922.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

You are urged by ex-service men of State to use utmost effort to secure immediate consideration of adjusted compensation bill, which has been pending two years. I understand will be reconsidered Monday. May we expect your whole-hearted support?

SYDNEY ELLIOTT,
Department Commander Veterans of Foreign Wars United States of America, Albuquerque, N. Mex.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to suggest further that as time progresses in the consideration of the tariff bill there will be from day to day an insistent demand that the adjusted compensation legislation be taken up and disposed of. Hesitation has been evidenced because we are told there is a lack of money in the Treasury with which to pay. I want to make the observation that if those who are managing the financial affairs of the country were to devote one-half the energy and one-half the intellectual consideration in trying to find methods for paying this debt, instead of not paying it, there would be little if any difficulty in the way. There is no question that the means can and will be found sooner or later. Let this question of the adjusted compensation be considered and cared for in precisely the same manner as other claims against the Government growing out of the World War are cared for.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is true that in 1921 I honestly believed that we would dispose of the soldiers' compensation bill long before this time. It is equally true that in 1921, when the special session was called for the purpose of disposing of both a tariff bill and a revenue bill, I then thought we would get through with the tariff bill in 1921. The year 1922 is here; it is nearly July; and still we have not got through with the tariff bill which it was proposed should be disposed of in 1921.

It is true that after the President had given a sort of ultimatum as to the kind of a soldiers' compensation bill which would be agreeable to him, there was a long attempt made to find this way and that way to meet both the views of the President and the views of the Congress, which seemed to be different from those of the President, but all had a voice in the soldiers' compensation bill.

It is true that I hoped to have brought this measure to a showdown and a final vote long before this time. We have been delayed in a great many matters of legislation which we expected to have disposed of a long time ago.

In my estimate of last year that it would not necessitate any change in the time in which the compensation bill should go into effect, the long time taken upon the revenue bill and the tariff bill would naturally compel me to revise my judgment as to my estimate, I hope, not longer than the six months which the present bill provides, or three months longer than that which the bill as passed by the House provided.

I can not imagine a stronger position in which to place the bill than the position under the circumstances that the bill is now in. With the backing not only of the party in power, but the backing of both sides of the Chamber, first of the party in power that there shall be no recess over and no adjournment until it is finally disposed of, and that supplemented by the very overwhelming vote making it a special order as soon as we have a vote on the tariff bill, and with the privilege of calling it up at any time before, I feel that it is absolutely assured that it will pass during the present session.

I would be glad if we could take it up to-day and pass it in one or two or three days, but I appreciate the objections on the part of a great many to laying aside the tariff bill for any other bill, and I appreciate that that objection is governed more or less by the belief that we could get no time limit upon the consideration of the compensation bill and that there would not be a sufficient number of votes to take it up and then attempt to dispose of it in the short period in which a great many Senators might think the bill could be passed.

In each step that I have taken and in whatever position I have assumed—admitting that I was mistaken last year in the time within which I thought we could dispose of the bill—I at least have acted according to what I believed to be the most definite, certain, and sure way not only to get an adjusted compensation bill passed at this sessoin, but also to get a bill passed at this session which would be signed by the President when we completed it. I hope, Mr. President, that we may go on with the tariff bill for a little while, and that we may also consider the other bill. There is still time enough to get both bills through, and I hope that we shall get them both through by the 15th of August.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Dakota hold out hope that the adjusted compensation bill may come up prior to the disposal of the tariff bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not speak definitely as to that; I do not want to prophesy, but, candidly, I believe that if the tariff bill should be on the boards too long there would be a probability that we could take up the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill and dispose of it. I do not want the bills to block each other in any way, shape, or manner. I hope that at some time we shall arrive at a conclusion so that we may take up the soldiers' compensation bill and vote on it. I wish we could secure a unanimous consent agreement to take it up and consider it for not to exceed a certain number of days and then vote on it, but I appreciate that is an impossibility. I have tried to be square and straight with those Senators whose views differ from mine on the subject, and have endeavored to get the matter in such shape that we shall have as definite assurance as the Senate going on record can give that the compensation bill will be disposed of during the session.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been constrained to make the few remarks which I have made this afternoon largely by reason of an article which I have read to-day in the New York Journal of Commerce. According to that article, interested parties throughout the country are coming to Washington and insisting upon a review of the schedules of the tariff bill in which they are interested. We have also been told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance at different times that the committee was reviewing the various paragraphs. If that sort of thing is going on, certainly there can not be suggested any definite length of time during which the tariff bill will be under consideration. The tariff bill here, as it is written, has not behind it the views of a majority of the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee is daily considering the various paragraphs of the bill, and, as I am advised by the newspaper to which I have referred, the parties interested in the items of the various schedules are coming daily to the majority of the committee and insisting upon changes or that there shall be no changes or, at any rate, seeking to have a consideration anew of the various paragraphs.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I should like to propound a question to the Senator from New Mexico and to ask him if he wishes to put an end to the practice which he has described?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no control whatsoever over that matter.

Mr. MOSES. But will the Senator consent to give assistance in securing a unanimous consent agreement to vote on the tariff bill, say, on the 1st day of July?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I doubt if the chairman of the committee would agree to any such proposal as that.

Mr. MOSES. Then, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he is willing that an agreement may be secured to vote on the tariff bill on the 1st day of July?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I understand that the Senator from New Hampshire does not expect an affirmative reply, because the Senator knows that the tariff bill can not be considered by that time; but if he is willing to accept the bill just as it is, he is the first Senator that I have heard express himself to that effect on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. I do not want the Senator to draw any such inference from the question which I propounded to him. I thought the Senator was desirous of putting an end to the practice of which he read in the newspapers, and which he considered to be deleterious, and I thought he wished to expedite the consideration of the tariff bill. I merely wished to find out how genuine his sentiments were.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Committee on Finance in its rehearings on this bill, I think, has made very substantial modifications for the good of the country. If they are going to modify the bill along those lines——

Mr. MOSES. Why does the Senator delay the matter?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the good work will go on.

Mr. MOSES. I thought the Senator was complaining about the practice which was taking place.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What I was suggesting was that these interviews are going on; that there is no well-considered bill here, and it is evidence that there will be much time consumed in the further consideration of this bill before it is enacted into law, and for that reason I was suggesting the advisability of taking up the adjusted compensation bill and disposing of it. Of course, I know that the Senator from New Hampshire is opposed to the adjusted compensation bill and is perfectly willing to take up anything that will prevent its passage, but others of us look at the matter in a different light.

Mr. MOSES. I am entirely willing to vote on it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then why not let us vote on it?

Mr. MOSES. I am entirely willing to vote on the tariff bill, and I suggest to the Senator, inasmuch as we have already agreed that we will take up the adjusted compensation bill the day following the vote on the tariff bill that he permit us to vote on the tariff bill on the 1st of July.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, Mr. President, that was one of the things that was clearly evident yesterday when Senators were undertaking to put the bonus bill behind the tariff bill—and it was so expressed upon the floor—that it would be used as a lever to force action upon the tariff bill, even without adequate consideration.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator voted, however, to fix that date.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope that we can bring this matter to a close. It is desired to hold a brief executive session and then to have a recess.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I first yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he thinks there has only been adequate consideration of the bill so far?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is my judgment of the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator must conclude that we can not pass the tariff bill at this session of Congress, must he not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Wisconsin must know, as the matter has been discussed in the colloquy between us heretofore, that in the early consideration of this measure considerable time was taken in developing or attempting to develop the theory upon which this bill was framed. After it has been made apparent that there is no defined principle underlying the bill, we do not propose to try to bring that out much clearer than it has been brought out, and necessarily as much time proportionately will not be required in considering the remaining paragraphs of the bill as has been required previously.

Mr. LENROOT. Do we, then, have some assurance from the other side that hereafter discussion will be reasonably confined to the question before the Senate?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe the Senator will agree that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have seldom mentioned anything that did not relate to the bill under discussion.

Mr. LENROOT. That is quite true, but the Senator will also admit that if other Senators should occupy as much time as has the Senator from New Mexico it would take 20 years to pass the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Wisconsin must admit also that a large portion of this day—in fact, much the larger portion—has been taken up by Senators on the Republican side of the aisle in discussing matters which had no connection whatever with the tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. All of which the chairman of the committee, at least, exceedingly regrets.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And I do, too.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Secretary's desk. I do not think there will be any opposition to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CURTIS. Let the resolution be reported.

Mr. MOSES. I ask that the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 308), as follows:

Whereas it has been charged upon the floor of the Senate that each and every one of the regional Federal reserve banks of the United States has had printed and distributed at its own expense a speech delivered in the Senate by Senator GLASS, of Virginia, in which the position of Senator HEFLIN on the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board was assailed and criticized: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That all of said Federal reserve banks, except the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, which has already reported to the Senate, be, and they are hereby, requested, respectively, to furnish to the Senate in writing a list of the names and addresses of citizens to whom said speech was sent, and all information in their possession, respectively, called for in the following questions:

1. At whose instance was the speech in question of Senator GLASS sent out?
2. At whose expense was said speech printed and distributed?
3. How was the fund provided and how many copies of said speech were sent out and how much money was expended in printing and distributing said speech?
4. Did any member of the Federal Reserve Board suggest the printing or distribution of the said speech?
5. Was any letter sent out with said speech? If so, attach a copy to your report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I presented a similar resolution, which was adopted, with reference to the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta, and that bank has reported. I have been informed that a number of copies of the speech referred to have been sent out by the other Federal reserve banks. I am merely asking in the resolution that they be called upon to report as did the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, is the Senator from Alabama asking for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I do not suppose that any Senator will oppose its adoption.

Mr. McLEAN. In the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I object. I ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the resolution, it will be printed and go over under the rule.

JOHN PAUL DE BAAT DOELMAN.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report a joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 213) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and was considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands, to receive instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby and that the said John Paul de Baat Doelman shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said John Paul de Baat Doelman shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFERENCE ON PREVENTION OF POLLUTION.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 297) requesting the President of the United States to call a conference of maritime nations with a view to the adoption of effective means for the prevention of pollution of navigable waters by oil-burning and oil-carrying steamers by the dumping into such waters of oil waste, fuel oil, oil sludge, oil slop, tar residue, and water ballast. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the careless casting of oil refuse into the sea from oil-burning and oil-carrying steamers has become a serious menace to the maritime and the fishing industries of the United States and other countries; and

Whereas the fire hazard created by the accumulation of floating oil on the piles of piers and bulkheads into harbor waters is a growing source of alarm; and

Whereas most serious is the destruction of ocean fisheries resulting from the constant discharge into territorial waters of the waste products of the oil used for fuel on many steamers in place of coal, which threatens to exterminate the food fish, oysters, clams, crabs, and lobsters, which are a vital part of our various national food supplies; and

Whereas the dumping of this oil refuse is not only ruining the bathing beaches situate on the territorial waters of the various countries, which during the summer attract hundreds of thousands of people to the seashore resorts, but the depreciation in value of millions of dollars of seashore property is most alarming; and

Whereas this pollution takes place on the high seas as well as within territorial waters: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested to call a conference of maritime nations with a view to the adoption of effective means for the prevention of pollution of navigable waters.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its session on this calendar day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 22, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SUPPLEMENTARY EXTRADITION CONVENTION WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

In executive session this day the following supplementary convention was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a supplementary extradition convention concluded between the United States and Great Britain at London on May 15, 1922, adding "willful desertion or willful nonsupport of minor or dependent children" in the United States and Canada to the list of crimes on account of which extradition may be granted.

As is explained in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State, this convention is in substitution of the convention signed at London on January 15, 1917, which provided extradition for "willful desertion or willful nonsupport of wife or children" and which the Senate by its resolution of April 27, 1921, amended so as to make the offense "willful desertion or willful nonsupport of minor or dependent children."

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 12, 1922.

The PRESIDENT:

On January 15, 1917, a supplementary extradition treaty, making "willful desertion or willful nonsupport of wife or children" in the United States and Canada an extraditable offense, was concluded between the United States and Great Britain.

By its resolution of April 27, 1921, the Senate amended the said convention by striking out the words "wife or" and inserting before the word "children" the words "minor or dependent," so that the offense should read, "willful desertion or willful nonsupport of minor or dependent children."

The amendment was accepted by the British Government, which preferred, however, that a new convention be signed in substitution of the amended one.

The new convention was signed at London on May 15, 1922, and is herewith laid before the President with a view, if the President approve thereof, to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 12, 1922.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being desirous of enlarging the list of crimes on account of which extradition may be granted under the conventions concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 12th July, 1889, and the 13th December, 1900, and the 12th April, 1905, with a view to the better administration of justice and the prevention of crime, have resolved to conclude a supplementary convention for this purpose, and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries, to wit:

The President of the United States; the Hon. George Harvey, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of His Britannic Majesty; and

His Britannic Majesty; the Most Honorable the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, K. C., His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The following crimes are, subject to the provision contained in article 2 hereof, added to the list of crimes numbered 1 to 10 in the first article of the said convention of the 12th July, 1889, and to the list of crimes numbered 11 to 13 in article 1 of the supplementary convention concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 13th December, 1900, and to the list of crimes numbered 14 to 15 in article 1 of the supplementary convention concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 12th April, 1905—that is to say:

16. Willful desertion or willful nonsupport of minor or dependent children.

ARTICLE 2.

The operation of the present convention is confined to cases in which the offenses mentioned in the preceding article having been committed in the United States or in the Dominion of Canada, the person charged with the offense is found in the Dominion of Canada or in the United States, respectively.

ARTICLE 3.

The present convention shall be considered as an integral part of the said extradition conventions of the 12th July, 1889, and the 13th December, 1900, and the 12th April, 1905, and the first article of the said convention of the 12th July, 1889, shall be read as if the lists of crimes therein contained had originally comprised the additional crimes specified and numbered 16 in the first article of the present convention, subject to the provision contained in article 2.

The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged either at Washington or London as soon as possible.

It shall come into force 10 days after its publication in conformity with the laws of the high contracting parties, and it shall continue and terminate in the same manner as the said convention of the 12th July, 1889.

In testimony whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate, and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at London, this 15th day of May, 1922.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy, holy, holy Lord God. Thy infinite nature and the protection of divine care stir our gratitude. We bless Thee that there is a merciful restraint to Thy power and no limit to Thy grace. O God of the nations, look upon our own and bless it abundantly and richly. Help us to put our best resources on the altar of its needs. Make us brave as we face the high standards of service set before us. Inspire us to labor for the defense and honor of all worthy causes, and may we lay no claim to personal reward, but may the trophies of victory be a united people, a prosperous and happy citizenship, and a country that follows righteousness and fears the wrong. In Thy name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MINORITY VIEWS ON SHIP SUBSIDY BILL.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent was granted a few days ago that the minority might have five legislative days within which to file minority views on the ship subsidy bill, and I rise now to ask unanimous consent that we may have five additional days within which to file those views. There has been a delay in printing the majority report, so that that report was not available until yesterday. It is a voluminous document of 35 pages. We have spoken to the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries [Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts] and to other Members of that committee, and they have no objection to this further extension.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the minority may have five additional legislative days within which to file minority views on the ship subsidy bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 494. An act for the relief of Benjamin O'Kerlee;

S. 426. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled 'An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court,' and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910; and

S. 3156. An act to change the terms of the district court for the northern division of the southern district of Alabama.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 313) providing for the disposal of articles produced by patients in the United States Veterans' Bureau.

SHIP SUBSIDY LEGISLATION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read by the Clerk and inserted in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to have read a letter addressed to him by the President of the United States. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 20, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. MONDELL: You have been advised by those who have discussed the matter with me in personal interview that I am in complete accord with the opinion of leaders among the majority in the House that the final consideration of the merchant marine bill in the House might well be postponed until approximately such time as House Members will be called in active attendance to send the tariff bill to conference. I am writing to give formal confirmation and to express the satisfaction with which I contemplate having this measure taken directly by Members to their constituencies for such reaction as will enable them to translate the deliberate preference of the country into a national policy fixed by law.

If it were practical to secure final action on a measure of such importance in the 60 actual working days of the short term of Congress, I would gladly postpone action until after the general elections and ask a renewed expression of the people at the polls.

Unfortunately for such a program, the national interests will not admit of such postponement, and I should feel myself remiss in a public duty if I did not ask a decision before the present session is finally ended.

There was an expression of the popular mind in 1920. The party now charged with responsibility spoke in no uncertain terms about the "promotion and maintenance of an American merchant marine." The question was not made paramount, but the pledge was covenanted, and it was well understood, because the people knew in a very general way that vast tonnage in shipping was a Government possession as the result of war activities, and a practical Government must turn this one war asset to permanent, peace-time advantage. Literally we have a merchant marine, poorly balanced, because the war construction was emergency construction, building anything and everything we could, at any cost, without serious thought of its possibilities in the sea service of peace. Moreover, it is largely Government-owned, operated at a loss to the Government Treasury. In spite of every drive toward economy, in spite of suspended service and the cancellation of contracts for operation in the Government's behalf, in spite of radical reformation in the Government's shipping activities, and suspended lines much sought by American commercial interests, the plain, blunt truth is that Government shipping has cost the Treasury more than a $50,000,000 loss during the fiscal year now closing. This does not include depreciation or deterioration, running into millions more, and we have a practical problem which can not be ignored by either the executive or legislative branch of the Government or by the American people, of every section, who must supply the Treasury funds.

Perhaps this venture in Government pursuit of what ought to be a private business would be looked upon with complacency if we were making even a slight degree of progress toward a permanent and efficient merchant marine. But we are not succeeding. The vital element of private initiative and genius for business success is lacking and our inefficient activities are discouraging and disheartening the few who have sought to establish shipping lines on private account. There is no fault to be charged to the Shipping Board as it is now organized. Losses aggregating sixteen millions a month have been reduced to substantially one-fourth that sum. The reminder is not a criticism of what had developed out of war service and war construction. Our first thought then was national survival. There was war inflation and the excesses in commerce in the immediate aftermath. Then there came to shipping a slump beyond all comparison with other activities. Our ships costing three billions suddenly became worth only a fraction thereof and there was no market in which to sell at any price. Profitable operation turned to shocking deficits and only drastic curtailment of activities saved us from the astounding losses which were ensuing when the present board was organized.

We have, therefore, two outstanding problems which must be met, in the solution of which Congress must share the responsibility and regarding which there can be but one opinion when our people are acquainted with the facts. One is the handling of our shipping assets to the highest advantage without continued loss to the Public Treasury. The other is the establishment of an efficient merchant marine, when opportunity is beckoning as never before, as an agency of commerce and an avenue to influence in peace and an indispensable element of defense if we are again involved in war. No argument is needed on the last essential other than the reminder that we builded our vast tonnage as a war necessity, and no one thought to complain of the excessive cost or the ultimate accounting.

The question is not to be prejudiced by the old and worn-out cry against subsidy. If there is insistent use of a term so long employed to awaken public hostility, let it be known that we are subsidizing to-day by paying losses aggregating fifty millions a year for inadequate service of no permanence, while the pending measure contemplates no such outlay and is paid only for specified service, which is the base of a merchant marine fit to compete with the maritime powers of the world. Moreover, the term subsidy, implying bestowal upon special interests, can no longer be applied to a public service where the aid is extended only until a normal earning is developed, and must be returned after the earnings reach a 10 per cent return on actual investment, certified under Government audits. All this the pending measure provides.

The larger question is that of national policy in availing ourselves of our tonnage and the present opportunity to establish a great American merchant marine. If we are to think of only a self-contained Republic, aloof from the world, perhaps we may go on depending upon our competitors for our carriers by sea. But such a course challenges every aspiration and narrows our vision. No nation ever has maintained enduring prominence or abiding good fortune except in proportion to its eminence on the seas. It is the unvarying story of national power and influence throughout all civilization. The rare development of our own land in a century and a half of national life is no contradiction, because we were boundless in our untouched resources until now, and even with them we felt the impetus of our sea-carrying power until steam and oil superseded the sails which whitened the seas.

In the new order of the world we shall no longer be self-contained, but in shipping we must become self-reliant. We ask no favors, but we do believe in American genius and capacity under equal opportunity. It does not become us to go on paying shipping tolls to the world when our righteous purposes in trade are better promoted by serving ourselves in making our tenders in the marts of the world.

At the risk of excessive length, let me point out what I believed to be a well-screened source of opposition to an outstanding and confident American course in this matter. No well-developed maritime power of the Old World is craving the development of our shipping. We can not complain thereat. I confess an admiration for the national spirit which always thinks of the interests of the homeland first. I crave its manifestation here at home in solving this problem. Other nations know the value of sea carrying as an adjunct of trade, and the individual discouragement abroad to our worthy aims—a discouragement often insidiously disseminated here—ought to argue an American interest no longer to be ignored.

I have not attempted to argue the merits of the pending bill in detail. I do hope to have Members convey to agricultural, mining, and industrial constituencies the relation of future shipping and foreign trade to the maintained good fortunes in their pursuits, and stress the fact that now, if ever, with ships ready for cargoes and crews, our people must take their place on the seas or surrender every such aspiration and liquidate at whatever price is necessary the assets at our command. Even if we mistakenly assent to liquidate I am well persuaded that the favoring policy contemplated in the bill will save hundreds of millions in that liquidation. The rightful course concerns our immediate good fortune, and has infinitely more to do with the fortunes and the prestige of the greater Republic which is ever in the making.

Frankly, I feel deeply the responsibility. I think it a national calamity to fail in the waiting opportunity. I can not but believe the American people will be in accord. If they appraise the immediate problem in the continuation of losing millions, through our present operation, and sense the situation as it relates to the American future, I believe Congressmen will return from the contact with the people at home confident that the merchant marine bill is no less appealing than relief to agriculture in distress or to railroads in their necessity. It is not in my mind to appeal in behalf of a special interest in America. I confidently believe that if you and your associates will take the problem to the people at home you will encounter a very favorable reaction on a patriotic interest which concerns all America, conspicuously to-day and of greater consequence to our future.

Sincerely yours, WARREN G. HARDING.

Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] may address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. On what subject?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On the subject of the letter just read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I think it a matter of regret that the great Republican newspapers of the country have recently grossly misrepresented the attitude of the President in stating that he demanded action upon this ship subsidy bill before there should be a recess of the House. Certainly, we all understood that until a few days ago. The gentlemen who are in charge of the legislative program of the House have evidently convinced the President that really, as a matter of fact, this bill is of not such great importance as he thought it, and that it is of more importance that Members should return to their homes, and the President has surrendered, and in the hope that he may convince the people of the country of the wisdom of his position, has written to the majority leader the letter which has just been read to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the President will have to do more than he has done in that letter before he can cause such a change of the views of the people of this country as will reverse the attitude of the Members of the House on the ship subsidy question. I know that some gentlemen on the Republican side of the House believe, because they voted for $1,715,000 as an advertising fund for the Shipping Board, that through the wise and discreet administration of that fund there will be such a favorable sentiment created for this ship subsidy bill as will enable them to get by, but when these Members return to their homes I hope that they will explain to their people whether or not they knew when they voted $1,715,000 of the money of the taxpayers to the Shipping Board for advertising purposes, that the Shipping Board under the direction of the gentleman who is influencing the attitude of the President in this matter, Mr. Lasker, was going to spend that fund in advertising in foreign newspapers the fact that alcoholic liquors were for sale on ships flying the American flag, while failing to do so in the newspapers of the United States, thus deceiving the people of the country as to what was actually occurring on board the ships of the United States Government. I want them, also, to tell the people in answer to what the President has said in this letter that the Shipping Board which he says is economically administering our merchant marine has been here demanding appropriations to pay salaries of $35,000, $25,000, $20,000 a year, and demanding the right to pay attorneys, large numbers of them, more than $11,000 a year, when the Department of Justice charged with the conduct of the legal business of the Government has never asked such appropriation for attorneys, regular or special. I want them, also, to tell the people why it is that the President urges a subsidy for the merchant marine industry, which has lost $50,000,000 this year, and fails to urge a subsidy or any other relief for the agricultural industry of the country which has lost billions since his administration came into power.

Because last year the Shipping Board lost $50,000,000, a subsidy is necessary, and the farmers of the country must be taxed through all the years to come to reimburse the shipping interests to the extent of $100,000,000 a year. Last year the farmers lost hundreds of millions, but the President did not urge financial relief for them. All that he could do for them was to invite a selected few to Washington to a conference and make to them a speech. The President says we ought to do as much for the shipping industry as was done for the railroad and the agricultural interests in distress. Under the Esch-Cummins bill this administration has done something for the railroads. They have guaranteed them rates which will yield to them a minimum of 5½ per cent. They are assured against loss, at the expense of the people. Now, when it comes to the shipping interests in distress, we are to go down into the Treasury and take the tax money of the people to make them whole. I ask you to point to any legislation which has for its purpose the subsidizing or financial relief of the agricultural interests, which have been in greater distress than any other interest during the past two years. The President gave them a speech, but gives the shipping interests a subsidy.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman state right there what the previous Democratic administration had done to the railroads?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The previous administration did not go down into the pockets of the people and guarantee by a subsidy any of the losses that the railroads of this country might incur. It was left to your administration to provide rates that would guarantee a profit. When the railroads were taken over by the previous administration they were taken over to successfully prosecute the war by the vote of the gentleman from New York and every other gentleman in this House——

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not, because I want to call attention to some other things for which the President pleads in this letter. He pleads when you go home you urge your constituents to stand for a bill which would grant a subsidy to the Standard Oil Co. in transporting its own products in its own bottoms.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is not the provision that is provided in the last print of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Why, your committee in its last print has taken from it the only thing that left any doubt, and makes it certain that the bill as it stands will grant a subsidy to the United States Steel Co. as well as the Standard Oil Co. for carrying their own products.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman say when they are carrying their own goods?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Carrying their own products.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It does.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. There is no doubt in the mind of any gentleman who has studied the bill. The very fact you have in the last print eliminated the only provision that would cast any doubt makes my interpretation certain.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is true as to foreign trade.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want to ask the farmer of the country if he wants to pay a subsidy to the United States Steel Corporation and the Standard Oil Co. using their own ships, guaranteeing them a profit in carrying on their own business? If it is fair to tax them to pay the Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel Co., why is it not fair to guarantee the farmers a profit in their wheat and their corn and their cotton and other agricultural products in this country? During the past year every merchant, every miner, has suffered a loss. Why not subsidize them instead of taxing them to pay the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that in September, 1920, the great crime of deflation was had against the farmers and producers of this country under a Democratic administration and under their appointees?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman has not been in his district since this administration started, he may not know it, but if he returns he will find that the deflation belongs to this administration, and that while under the Democratic administration your people were riding around in automobiles, under this administration they are walking around, seeking an opportunity to make a living. Many are in want in your district and in every other district in the country, and when your people realize that under the proposal of your President you are going to take what little money they have left, tax them, and turn it over to the Standard Oil, the United States Steel, and the shipping interests, they are going to entertain the same view of this letter that they held as to his letter urging you to reduce the surtaxes upon the millionaires of the country.

This letter of the President also says under this administration the Shipping Board has reduced the losses from $16,000,000 to $4,000,000 a month. The President wants to be fair, and, of course, would have been fair, but did not know it, because the director of the Shipping Board, this great genius in shipping affairs, Admiral Lasker, of the Lasker Advertising Agency, did not tell him about it. When he reduced the loss from $16,000,000 to $4,000,000 he reduced it because he reduced the number of ships in operation. If he had taken all ships off the sea in the last year he would not have had any loss at all. But there was not any business in the country during last year that did not suffer loss. Every other business suffered a loss. If you based action upon the profits of 1919 and 1920 there would be no subsidy. But because of extravagance and the general slump in business there was a loss last year, and therefore the people must be taxed through all the years to come. And while you tax the people to put our ships upon the sea you enact a tariff law to prevent imports and thus prevent our ships from securing return cargoes. At a time when the wages of the laboring people are being reduced, when the miner is out of work and the farmer has almost lost hope, you propose to tax them to pay a subsidy to the United States Steel Trust and the Standard Oil Co.

I want my friends of the Middle West to return and tell their people that story, and I have no doubt of the result when they come back. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all appreciate very greatly the splendid letter from the President which was read this morning. Fine as it is, clear as it is, logical and convincing as it is, I did not anticipate it was going to strike so deep or so seriously interfere with the peace of mind on the Democratic side as it seems to have done. It certainly has stirred the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]; stirred him so deeply that, accurate as he generally is in his statements, he has been quite as inaccurate in many of the statements he has made this morning as a man can well be who wants to tell the truth. The gentleman among other things stated that we guaranteed returns to the railroads. The gentleman knows perfectly well that that is not true. He knows perfectly well that the railroads of the country under the rates which have been established have been carning on an average about 2¾ to 3¼ per cent on the value of their property as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and there is no guaranty anywhere from anybody that they shall receive any more than they may earn under the rates that have been established.

The gentleman talks about extravagance in the operation of our ships. Well, if there is one subject on which the gentlemen on that side ought to keep silent, profoundly silent, it is on the question of expenditures connected with the building up of a commercial fleet. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is very brief.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I know.

Mr. MONDELL. And I say, with the certainty that there can be no successful contradiction by any man acquainted with the facts, that there never has been in all recorded time so sad, sordid, and miserable a story of wanton waste and extravagance as the story of the extravagance in connection with the building of our merchant fleet under the Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Very briefly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman be specific?

Mr. MONDELL. Be specific?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. If I were called upon to recite in detail all of the waste and extravagance, I would need not 10 minutes but ten times 10 minutes, and then I would only get fairly started. [Applause on the Republican side.] Nobody denies it; nobody questions it. The President of the United States in the letter that has just been read is, out of the goodness of his heart, too generous in his statement in regard to the cost of that fleet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. He, kindly and considerate, did not want to harrow the feelings of the gentlemen on that side, and I have no disposition to do so. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] talks about two or three appropriations for salaries. They were so insignificant in amount as compared with the millions of waste and extravagance that gentlemen on that side at least ought not refer to them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry. I can not yield in the brief time that I have.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. MONDELL. We are all of us responsible for the great fleet of merchant ships we have, because, following our patriotic impulses during the period of the war, we did what the administration asked to have done in the way of appropriation and authorization. We were compelled under the circumstances to resolve every doubt in favor of the view of the administration and in favor of the interests of our country as the administration viewed them. So, to a certain extent, we are responsible. But your administration and your party are responsible for the conditions and practices of awful waste and extravagance under which that fleet was created. And the least that you could do in common decency would be to join with us on a plan for taking care of, providing for, and making useful to the people of the United States the great fleet so built while your party was in power.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. What are we to do with this enormous fleet? What are we going to say to the country relative to the three and one-half billion dollars spent to build it? Shall we allow the ships to rot at the dock? Shall we supinely submit to the creation of conditions under which our merchant flag shall be driven from the high seas? No, verily. You placed this burden upon us; yours was the first responsibility. [Applause on the Republican side.] The burden is here. We accept it, because in good conscience we must accept it, and, in the courage that has always distinguished our side, we shall go forward to the solution of the problem confronting us. We shall see that American shipping is not driven from the seas. [Applause on the Republican side.] We shall see that our flag floats from merchant ships in all the seven seas and wherever men carry on trade and commerce. And out of the difficulties that confront us, out of the burden which you placed upon the American people, we hope to bring a fleet that eventually will be the finest in all the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman object to withholding that for a moment and give me a chance to take two or three minutes?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman knows I do not desire to continue the discussion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know; but I am not responsible for it. I would like to proceed for three minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, during a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming, had I not seen him I should have supposed it was Mr. WOODRUFF speaking. Here and now let us be done with the camouflage and the absurdity. Will the gentleman from Wyoming now, within my time, name a specific case of the Shipping Board that he would prosecute or ask to be prosecuted?

Mr. MONDELL. What was the last?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That he would prosecute or ask that they be prosecuted.

Mr. MONDELL. I was not talking about prosecution. I was talking about willful, wicked waste, most of it carried on under the orders of the administration, and therefore not punishable as a crime. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Wyoming therefore excuses and makes it easy for the present Attorney General in the future. Is that right?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman can not shift the question that way. The question is not that of criminal prosecution, but of willful, continuous, and all-pervading waste. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I just wish to call attention to the undisputed fact that even under the previous administration practically all of those who were in charge of the Shipping Board, especially during the construction period, were Republicans, to wit, Gen. George W. Goethals, Charles M. Schwab, Mr. Piez, Mr. Rossiter, and others, and that the three men who were called to the Shipping Board as experts, two at $35,000 and one at $25,000, held important positions in the former Shipping Board.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman who propounded the question, it is not so much with some of us who admit that there has been some extravagance under both Republicans and Democrats, but why in the name of heaven do you not stop it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] You ought to stop it now. That is what is the matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. We have stopped the operations of some of the Democratic officials who were guilty of extravagance.

Mr. GARNER. You ought to kick them out, then, if they are guilty of extravagance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that is a very serious remark made by a very serious gentleman—that is, the majority leader—that there are a number of Democrats in positions of power now under the Shipping Board, so I understood the gentleman to mean. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] talked about this extravagance it occured to me that there might still be some hold-overs who had not gotten over the habits of extravagance that they acquired under the former administration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Just exactly what did the gentleman mean by that remark?

Mr. MONDELL. Just what I said. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That, of course, means nothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when we entered into the war the greatest problem we had was the one of ocean transportation. We knew how to gather together an army and train it; we knew how to supply the munitions of war; but the great problem at that time was the matter of transportation, and the greatest problem which to-day is before the American people is the shipping problem, the question whether we shall abandon our merchant marine or attempt to maintain an American merchant marine, and if so, how and upon what terms.

We have the responsibility upon this side of the House. We shall have to determine the policy of the Government. Whether there has been waste and extravagance in the past, which all admit, it will not aid very much in making up our minds as to the future course. But let us try to approach this subject as statesmen. All we can expect from the other side of the House is that they will be constantly searching for and trying to point out flyspecks. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the only service they render. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have the responsibility. Let us attend to it, and let us give to the American people legislation which will provide that when war comes again we shall not be called upon again to spend wastefully three or four billions of dollars in attempting to provide for transportation which is not ready until the war is over. We would have finished the war before we did at far less expense if we had had an American merchant marine. And meanwhile do not pay too much attention to the gentleman from South Carolina and other gentlemen seeking to point out flyspecks. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. After the gentleman from Iowa is through, may I have recognition to make the request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the gentleman from Iowa has concluded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I call attention to the fact that we have with us to-day the Philippine Parliamentary Mission, who are now making an official visit to this country, and who are at this moment occupying seats in the gallery. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly fitting that they should visit the Congress of the United States, for we are proud to claim them as our legislative children. We have given them, and they have gladly received and assimilated, our form and most of our procedure.

The present Philippine organic act is a complete constitution of government. It created a government with more power and more privileges than has any State of the Union. It has a bill of rights with more assurance of self-government than is contained in the Constitution of the United States, and with better guaranties of individual liberty than, when made, were contained in any constitution of any nation or State then in existence. It has a legislature composed of two houses, the members of which are elected by the people. It has an independent judiciary modeled after our own. The members of their cabinet have greater prestige and influence with the lawmakers than have the Secretaries of departments at Washington.

Regarding the personnel and the methods of procedure of the Philippine Legislature, it may be said that most of the members of both houses are educated men and many of them are able orators and keen debaters. The decorum and dignity of their procedure is worthy of the highest praise. Of their presiding officers, Mr. Quezon, president of the senate, and Mr. Osmena, speaker of the house, it may be said that it would be difficult to find abler leaders or better presiding officers in any parliamentary body. [Applause.]

I hope the Members of the House will personally meet the members of the mission so they may be able to know and appreciate their high character and personal charm. Both the presiding officers are here, Mr. Quezon and Mr. Osmena. There are six members of the senate and nine members of the house, and I think those who meet them will agree that the honor conferred upon them by their selection as members of this mission has been worthily bestowed. The Speaker will receive the mission informally at once in his rooms, and it is desired that as many of the Members of the House as can do so will meet them there also.

Mr. Speaker, whatever may be our position with respect to matters upon which there may be differences of opinion, we will forget them to-day and only remember that we are brother legislators, with high regard and best wishes for the greatest measure of success possible within our respective spheres of action. We believe that to know each other better will be to respect and honor each other more, and that this visit can have no other result than to further the interests of the people whom we love and strive to serve. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the petition which the commission has already presented to the President, together with the statement of the personnel of that commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

PHILIPPINE PARLIAMENTARY MISSION
TO THE UNITED STATES, 1922,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1922.

The House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: With the deepest sense of loyalty and confidence in the American people, the Philippine Legislature has decided to send the present parliamentary mission to the United States. The mission brings a message of good will and friendship from the Filipino people to the people of the United States and is charged to resume the negotiations for the independence of the Philippines begun by the first mission sent in 1919.

The people of the Philippine Islands yearn to see the fulfillment of their aspirations for national existence. This desire, always strong, has grown with every year. While the Great War was on they desisted from active agitation for independence, not because it had become less dear to them but because they felt the broad issues of freedom and democracy for the world depended upon the outcome of that war and because their loyalty and affection to the United States bade them lay aside for the moment their own cause for the sake of that which embraced all mankind.

Realizing that the war ideals of America were their own, that the struggle for democracy and the rights of smaller peoples was also their own struggle, they placed all the resources of the islands at the disposal of the United States and offered their sons for the battle fields of Europe. As expressed by the then highest American representative in the Philippines, "Every sentiment, every impulse, every hope of the Filipinos was enlisted in the cause of the United States."

With the ending of the war the Filipino people felt that the principle for which they had contended had triumphed with the triumph of the Allies and the associated powers. With hopes renewed and faith strengthened they resumed the work for their own cause. Hence on March 9, 1919, the Philippine Legislature approved what was officially known as the "Declaration of purposes," which remains to-day an official authoritative pronouncement of the people on what should be their attitude toward and relations with the United States.

The Philippine Legislature declared that the "stable government" required in the preamble of the Jones law as the only prerequisite to independence had already been established in the Philippines; hence "a full and final exchange of views between the United States of America and the Philippine Islands" was deemed necessary. The time had come for the fulfillment of the American pledge. The first Philippine mission was asked to "convey to the Government of the United States the frankest assurances of the good will, friendship, and gratitude of the Filipino people and to submit with as much respect as confidence the question of Philippine independence with a view to its final settlement."

When the first mission reached the United States, however, it found the American people and Government still absorbed in their international problems. The President was in Europe negotiating the treaty of Versailles; but realizing that the fulfillment of the American obligations toward the Philippines could not be delayed any longer, he requested the Secretary of War to receive the mission in his behalf and expressed the belief that the end was almost in sight of the work undertaken in the islands by Americans and Filipinos.

Soon thereafter, when the American people and Government had been relieved of many of their pressing international burdens and distractions, the petition of the Philippine Legislature through the Philippine mission received the favorable indorsement of the administration in Washington. President Wilson, in his message to Congress on December 2, 1920, officially recognized the fulfillment of the only condition required of the Philippines as a prerequisite to a separate national existence—a stable government—and formally recommended the immediate granting of independence. He said: "Allow me to call your attention to the fact that the people of the Philippine Islands have succeeded in maintaining a stable government since the last action of the Congress in their behalf, and have thus fulfilled the condition set by the Congress as precedent to a consideration of granting independence to the islands.

"I respectfully submit that this condition precedent having been fulfilled, it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to the people of those islands by granting them the independence which they so honorably covet."

This recommendation was made after the highest representative of America in the Philippines, the Governor General, had officially certified both to Congress and to the President of the United States that a stable government had already been established in the islands.

It is a fact, therefore, that immediately prior to the coming into power of the present administration the Philippine question was on the eve of solution. The solemn covenant, as the author of the Jones law had called it, between the American and the Filipino peoples was about to be fulfilled. The Philippine Legislature had declared that there was a stable government in the Philippines and the highest magistrate of the United States and the American representative in the Philippines concurred in the view.

We beg to submit that the last 15 months that have elapsed since the new administration has assumed office have not altered the situation. The same stable government exists. Contrary to what some may aver, the phrase "a stable government" does not convey a vague and indefinite condition. It has a specific and well-established meaning. The international relations of the United States for the last century and a half, especially her dealings with the South American countries, bear this statement out.

President McKinley in addressing the Cuban people defined a stable government as one "capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity, and the security of its citizens as well as our own." It must be remembered that the term "stable government" in the Jones law had been adopted directly from the American promises to the Cuban people. It can not, therefore, but have the same meaning. It is worth noting that recently a similar interpretation has been given to that phrase by the League of Nations.

No American official, whether of the past or present administration, has denied the statement of the Philippine Legislature, the certificate of the Governor General, and the finding of the President of the United States to the effect that we have established the "stable government" required by the Jones law in accordance with the interpretation universal usage has assigned to those words. Even the report of the Wood-Forbes mission, which is unwarrantably severe and critical, does not deny this assertion.

There are apparently in President McKinley's estimate two main elements in a stable government: First, ability to maintain order and insure peace and tranquillity and the security of citizens; second, ability to observe international obligations. To these two elements Mr. Root, in his instructions for the Cuban people, added the following: "It must rest upon the peaceful suffrages of the people and must contain constitutional limitations to protect the people from the arbitrary actions of the Government." All these elements are to be found in the Philippines to-day.

It is admitted by the Wood-Forbes mission that order has been properly maintained and that our insular police or constabulary "has proved itself to be dependable and thoroughly efficient." (P. 23 of the report.) The tranquillity and security of the citizens are not jeopardized. "They are naturally an orderly and law-abiding people" (p. 19), said the report.

As to obligations for international life, the Wood-Forbes mission recognizes that there are people in our service that would do credit to any government. "We find that the legislative chambers are conducted with dignity and decorum and are composed of representative men" (p. 45), observed the Wood-Forbes report.

The Filipino people are by nature and tradition hospitable and courteous to foreigners. There has been no antiforeign agitation or outbreak. The business of foreigners has been amply protected and will continue to be so protected under an independent Philippines. During the short-lived Philippine Republic prisoners of war were treated according to the law of nations and there was security for foreigners.

The insular, provincial, and municipal governments of the Philippines rest on the free and peaceful suffrage of the people. The people elect members of the insular legislature, provincial governors, members of the provincial boards, municipal presidents, and members of the municipal councils. Speaking of the elections of 1919, the report said: "Interest in the elections was widespread, and election day passed without any serious disturbances. There was a general, quiet acceptance by the minority of the results of the popular vote * * *" (p. 42). The elections held a few days ago, though vigorously contested, have again demonstrated the capacity of the Filipino people for the orderly exercise of popular franchise.

The structure and workings of our government also conform to the standard defined by Mr. Root in that it is "subject to the limitations and safeguards which the experience of a constitutional government has shown to be necessary to the preservation of individual rights." The Filipino people fought for such constitutional safeguards during the Spanish régime. A modern bill of rights was inserted in the constitution of the Philippine Republic. Our present constitutional limitations and safeguards have been in operation since 1900, when President McKinley, in his instructions to the second Philippine Commission, set down as inviolable rules the fundamental provisions of the American Bill of Rights. Those provisions with slight modifications were later included in the organic act of 1902, and again set forth in the Jones law of 1916. For more than 20 years, therefore, the Philippine Government has been subject to constitutional practices. They are embedded in the political life of the people, and no matter what political change may occur in the Philippines they will find no material alteration. An impartial judiciary is there to enforce them.

"The supreme court," said the Wood-Forbes report, "has the respect and confidence of the Filipino people" (p. 24). The courts of first instance, now mostly presided over by Filipinos ever since 1914, have maintained a standard which, in general, compares favorably with the State courts of the Union. From August 31, 1911, to September 1, 1913, during the last two years of Governor Forbes's administration, only 25.1 per cent of the decisions appealed from these courts were reversed by the supreme court. From March 3, 1919, to March 4, 1921, another period of two years with Filipinos in control, the percentage of reversals was decreased to 20.8 per cent. The number of cases disposed of by the courts of first instance from 1906 to 1913, inclusive, was as much as 82,528. The total number of cases disposed of for the same length of time with Filipinos in control (1914 to 1921, inclusive) was 117,357, or an increase of 34,829, or 42 per cent.

The last eight years in which the Filipinos have been given a larger control of governmental affairs have also seen a notable increase of the agencies of social and political progress, such as schools, roads, public buildings, hospitals, etc. In 1913, when the Filipino people had even less share in the government than they have now, there were enrolled in the public schools 440,050 pupils; in 1921 there were nearly a million (943,422). In 1913 there were only 2,934 public schools; in 1920 there were 5,944. In 1913 there were 2,171 kilometers of first-class roads in operation; in 1921 the figure was 4,608.8, in addition to about 5,000 kilometers of second-class roads. In 1913 there were no dispensaries where the poor could be given medical treatment; in 1921 there were over 800. In 1913 the appropriation for medical aid to the poor was ₱1,548,317.25; in 1921 the sum was ₱3,153,828.

Social and economic progress has also been tremendous during this period. In 1913 there were hardly a dozen women's clubs; in 1921 there were 342 in active work. In 1913 the volume of Philippine commerce was only ₱202,171,484; in 1920 it swelled to ₱601,124,276. The cultivated area in 1913 was 2,361,482 hectares, as compared with 3,276,942 hectares in 1920, 238.7 per cent increase.

The present conditions in the Philippines, even as alleged in the Wood-Forbes report, compare favorably with those existing in many nations whose right to national sovereignty is not open to the least question.

These are incontrovertible facts which no impartial witness can deny.

The present parliamentary mission, in which all political parties of the Philippine Islands are represented—the two wings of the Nationalist Party, on the one hand, and the Democratic Party, on the other—has been sent by the Philippine Legislature to ask for immediate, complete, and absolute independence of the Philippines. This desire is not born of ingratitude toward the United States, nor does it show lack of appreciation of the risks and dangers of international life. It is the logical outcome of more than 20 years of patient labors jointly undertaken by the Americans and Filipinos. The Filipino people firmly believe that the time has come when this question should be settled once for all. Further delay in the fulfillment of America's pledge contained in the Jones law will only result in injury to the best interests of both peoples.

Three years ago the impression of the members of the first Philippine mission was that the main objection in the mind of many Americans to the immediate independence of the Philippines was the danger of foreign aggression. While this is entirely outside of the question as to whether we have complied with the requirements of the Jones law, it may not be amiss to call the attention of those Americans to the great change in international affairs which has taken place since the visit of the last mission.

Wholesome relationship has especially been established in the Pacific area. The recent Washington conference has cleared away many doubts and misgivings.

Surely, after that conference has been hailed the world over as a solid foundation for international peace, the United States can not, without showing lack of faith in her own work, now say that she will not grant independence to the Philippines for fear of foreign hostile designs.

In the words of the President of the United States that conference was called "to provide some means whereby just, thoughtful, righteous peoples, who are not seeking to seize something which does not belong to them, can live peaceably together and eliminate cause of conflict." While the Filipino people realize that the international situation is not a necessary part of the condition prescribed in the Jones law as a prerequisite to independence, they crave the distinction of becoming the first nation to take advantage of the new order of things brought about by the Washington conference.

To the favorable international atmosphere may be added the fact that the first of colonial powers is already reversing her former policies. She has granted recognition of freedom and equality to peoples hitherto held as subjects and vassals. Egypt has regained her independence. The Irish people have been asked to enter into an agreement with England looking to the establishment of a free state. Liberal institutions are now being established in India.

We see in all these events the gradual triumph of American ideals, especially of that fundamental American principle that declared that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Hence we come to America in the full expectation that the United States can do no less than other nations have done to their dependencies; that she can not now refrain from practicing those principles which were initiated by her and followed by her sister nations; that she can not now refuse specific realization of those purposes and ideals, which found eloquent expression in her spokesmen both in times of war and in times of peaceful reconstruction; and that she will make the Filipino people a determining factor in the relationship that should exist between the United States and the only unincorporated and subject country now under the American flag.

We, therefore, submit our case, with faith and confidence, frankly and without evasion. It is the case of the Filipino people whom in fact and in law we represent; for certainly under the present circumstances no other agency can speak or act with as much authority on what the Filipino people want or on Philippine conditions in general as their duly accredited representatives. That is the very essence of representative government.

We reiterate that the present is the time for the United States completely to discharge its obligations to the Philippines. The Filipino people have fulfilled their part in the covenant with America. Their relations with the United States are of the most cordial and friendly nature. If the independence of the Philippines could now be secured as an amicable agreement between the two peoples, nay, even as an act of magnanimity on the part of a sovereign power, how much would that mean for the peace of the world! How much more would that add to the prestige of the United States when she again appears before the world as a champion of democracy and human liberty!

Respectfully submitted.

Manuel L. Quezon, chairman on the part of the senate; Pedro Guevara, member; Antero Soriano, member; Santiago A. Fonacier, member; Ceferino de Leon, member; Teodoro Sandiko, member. Sergio Osmena, chairman on the part of the house; Jose G. Generoso, member; Guillermo F. Pablo, member; Pedro Abad Santos, member; Celestino Gallares, member; Vicente Llanes, member; Juan Nolasco, member; Emilio P. Virata, member; Proceso Sebastian, member. Teodoro M. Sison, technical adviser; Arsenio N. Luz, technical adviser; Justo Lukban, technical adviser.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, very gratifying to have the pleasure and the honor of welcoming the delegation from the Philippines. So far as I know, there is only one difference between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and myself touching this matter. I would, Mr. Speaker, without hesitation respond to the petition as granted, and grant to the Philippines absolute, unqualified independence. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know upon what topic.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. WALSH. I object.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

House Resolution 374 (Rept. No. 1123).

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12073) entitled "A bill to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923." After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be divided and controlled equally between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall report the bill to the House and the previous question shall be considered ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, if adopted by the House——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present. I will withdraw that if I am given the privilege of addressing the House for three minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If any such condition as that is imposed, I will make the point of order myself.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I understood when the gentleman from Wyoming asked unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business that a deficiency bill was coming up.

Mr. MONDELL. I think I did say to the gentleman when asked what would be brought up that the Appropriations Committee would report a deficiency bill, and I thought we ought to take it up. However, the Committee on Appropriations has two bills to present and desires to present this bill first.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that it is rather unusual to ask that Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with by unanimous consent with a statement that certain procedure would be followed by the House and then change it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Texas feels that there is any question about it—what I had in mind was that the Committee on Appropriations had some bills that must be passed before we could recess, but I think the only one I referred to was the deficiency bill.

Mr. GARNER. The only thought in my mind is this, that there are some Members of the House who would like to be here to consider the bonus bill, and under the gentleman's statement they did not think it would come up to-day. But I will not object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will not object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if this resolution is adopted by the House, it makes in order for consideration immediately the bill H. R. 12073, a bill providing additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia and outside during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. We expected earlier in the year when we passed what we think was a scientific reclassification measure that it would not be necessary to take up on the floor of the House the question of additional compensation for civilian employees. But as that measure has not been considered at the other end of the Capitol, if it is the desire of the Members of the House to grant additional compensation to these civilian employees until such time as that measure may become a law, it will be necessary to consider it at this time for the reason that the present appropriation expires on June 30. I believe it is the desire of a great majority of the Members to consider this legislation at this time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to ask the gentleman if it was not distinctly understood by the membership of the House, and I think the gentleman from Illinois made the statement that we were going to give them the bonus, and that we were not going to have any discussion about it—that they need have no fear about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say that the gentleman from Illinois did not make any such statement.

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not want to misrepresent the gentleman, but I read in the press that the gentleman had given that out.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman must not believe all that he reads in the press. If the gentleman will read the RECORD, he will see what I said.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order a bill which provides that the bonus shall be $180 instead of $240. So far as I recall, there was no opposition to the rule before the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee took the position that it ought to give the House an opportunity to vote on this proposition. That is all there is in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], and I ask unanimous consent that he may proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from North Carolina yields eight minutes to the gentleman from Texas and asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed out of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the mildest possible way I wish to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in reference to the ship subsidy bill. As a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee I feel personally interested in the trend of those remarks. I want to say that for more than 11 years I have been a member of that committee and have been earnestly and honestly trying to help build up a great American merchant marine, and if any criticism of any action has been made by me it was certainly not in the way of flyspeck criticism. I supported and voted for the act of 1920 framed by the Republican majority of that committee, although at the time there were many serious objections to it, because I believed that in many particulars that bill was a great constructive measure.

I believe that it laid down the policies of this Government which ought to be pursued in order to build up an American merchant marine after eliminating some of its minor features. I wish to say now that I have not been like some Members of this House, and some outside of the House, casting not only flyspecks upon the administration and value of our great shipping property, but covering it with whole bucketfuls of filth and slime.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman approve, and did he approve, of that part of the act of 1920 contained in section 34, which permitted a 10 per cent——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question, and the gentleman knows full well that I did not approve that part of the act, and that part of the act two Presidents have held should not be enforced. If it is enforced, it will bring us back to the old doctrine of discriminating duties and involve us in conflicts with all the nations of the earth. The gentleman knows, as the present President knows, as the former President knows, that that would be the result. I am glad that two Presidents have had, as I hoped they would, the good sense not to try to execute section 34 of the act of 1920. What has given our American shipping the biggest black eye is the action and criticism and depreciation of the old Shipping Board by the chairman of the present board and his constant and continued depreciation of our Shipping Board ships and his iterated and reiterated assertion of our incapacity to compete with the shipping of the world. He and ship-owning subsidy hunters have given the dog a bad name; they have made it so that the public has lost all confidence in American capacity, and I think that the greatest injury to the American merchant marine prospect to-day is Chairman Lasker, of the Shipping Board, who from the moment of his appointment to that position has depreciated the worth and the value of our ships and our ability or capacity to compete with the world. I maintain that the American merchant marine and Congress is on trial to-day. I think the gentleman from Illinois, who preceded me, agreed at least some time in the past—about 1907—in the position that I maintain; that is, that the great American merchant marine, given an opportunity, will win its way to success on the oceans of the earth, but hothouse it into imbecility and it will fail and again disappear from the surface of the sea as it did under 60 years' administration of hothouse policy under the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want a great merchant marine; I want one that will prosper by affording the cheapest unit of transportation to overseas traffic, as our merchant marine did from 1830 to 1861, without any subsidy or other Government aid. Our farmers of the great West and South, and even of New England States, want the same, as appears from the testimony of the only genuine farm organization representatives before our committee, and they came voluntarily to oppose this bill. I want a merchant marine, but I am unwilling to saddle upon the back of the farmers and producers and consumers of the United States $100,000,000 annually in order to favor a few shipbuilders and owners in a futile effort to build a merchant marine with tax money of the people in unheard-of subsidies.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I corroborate what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] said in regard to this rule. There was no opposition in the committee. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 41, noes 1.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 249, nays 11, answered "present" 1, not voting 171, as follows:

On the vote:

Mr. Gallivan (for) with Mr. Byrns of Tennessee (against).

Additional pairs:

Mr. Kreider with Mr. Wingo.

Mr. Snyder with Mr. Garner.

Mr. Yates with Mr. Jacoway.

Mr. Larson of Minnesota with Mr. Garrett of Texas.

Mr. Vare with Mr. Griffin.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]. He is absent. If he were present, I would vote "aye." As he is absent, I desire to answer "present."

The name of Mr. CRAMTON was called, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12073.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it——

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 11.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present on the vote just had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Unquestionably there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 235, nays 12, answered "present" 2, not voting 181, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the subsidy advocate says that if you give our people the right to buy ships wherever they can get them the cheapest and use them under our flag in the coastwise trade you will destroy our shipyards. This I emphatically deny if you will continue the recently passed law giving free shipbuilding material without any restrictions whatsoever. The Republican Party in its anxiety to shelter our infant steel industry were never willing to do this.

The following is an extract from a speech of mine in the House in June, 1916:

In 1904 Congress passed an act creating a merchant-marine commission, composed of five Senators and five Representatives, with the duty of investigating and reporting at its next session what legislation, if any, was desirable for the development of the American merchant marine; and this commission visited and took testimony at all the leading cities of the country. This investigation shows that prior to the enactment of the Dingley law the handicap of high-priced iron needed by our shipbuilders was partly understood and attempted to be remedied by a clause in that law providing for the admission of shipbuilding material free. Unfortunately that Congress was so wedded to the idea of protection both for the iron manufacturer and for our coastwise shipping that they limited the free material to vessels built for foreign ownership or vessels of domestic ownership that should not engage in our coastwise trade more than two months in the year, and so they smothered the feeble purpose to emancipate our shipping by the stronger desire to shelter two favored lines of American industry from competition; and, commenting on the effect of that legislation, the House Committee on the Merchant Marine, Report No. 4136, Fifty-eighth Congress, say:

"No American shipowner under present conditions builds a deep-sea ship, even though she be designed primarily for foreign commerce, without considering that he may be glad some day to fall back on the coastwise trade. Therefore this apparently liberal privilege of free materials has not checked the decline of American ocean shipbuilding and has been availed of for the complete construction of only one large steel ship, the Dirigo, built by Arthur Sewell & Co. at Bath, Me. The Messrs. Sewell say that the peculiar status of the Dirigo is the cause of frequent anxiety to them, for if the vessel were to be more than two months on voyage from Puget Sound to Hawaii the duties would have to be paid on the foreign plates, angles, and beams of which she is constructed. American ships continue to be constructed of domestic steel, even when designed for foreign service. This fact lent large importance to certain testimony in the hearing of June 28, 1904, at Cleveland. Mr. James C. Wallace, then vice president of the American Shipbuilding Co., said:

"'Recently one of our largest steel mills sold abroad 100,000 tons of steel plate. They delivered it, I understand, at Belfast, at $24 a ton. That would practically mean, with ocean rates as they are, $22 a ton at tidewater. They are charging us to-day at Pittsburgh $32 a ton. A differential of $10 in a ship carrying 5,000 tons is $50,000.'"

So it is clear that the free ship-material clause of the Dingley law was a fraud, though doubtless not so intended. I will add here that we have at last passed a real free ship-material law, one that has no restrictions or limitations on it, and, as a result, our shipbuilders to-day pay no more for their iron and steel material than do the shipbuilders of England. Commenting on the testimony of Mr. Wallace and others, the Marine Commission says:

"It has been conclusively shown by testimony before this commission that the materials which enter into the construction of ships are sold by our factories and laid down in foreign shipyards for a price far below that charged to our own people."

And they quote a number of shipbuilders, among them John Roach, to the effect that the high cost of iron produced by the tariff upon it is one of the principal difficulties our commerce has to contend with. Mr. Roach said:

"If Congress will take off all the duties from American iron, then we are prepared to compete with foreign shipbuilders."

Remember that the United States is the only great nation on earth which does not give its citizens the full privilege of buying their ships where they can get them cheapest and sailing them in all trades.

The present House has passed a new tariff bill, and the present Senate is likely to pass it, putting back the duty on shipbuilding material. Undoubtedly the Republican Party is fully intending to go back to the policy of refusing our citizens the privilege of buying and operating under the flag any ship not built in the United States. It will be a sad day for the American shipping if we now take the back track and start out on the discriminating duty and subsidy pathway which leads, through international restrictions and retaliation and domestic inefficiency, greed, and corruption, to decay and death of our overseas merchant marine.

I have already discussed the monstrous subsidy provisions of the pending bill. No less important is the question involved in the bill of DISCRIMINATING DUTIES AND TONNAGE DUES.

It is involved in the provision giving a tax reduction to those who ship in American ships of 5 per cent of the freight they pay and by the proposal to levy tonnage and light dues on foreign ships for the benefit of American ships and the proposal to give special railway rates to goods exported or imported in American ships. These, doubtless, only mark the beginning of a policy which is beginning to assume a great prominence among shipping people. It is the question of discriminating duties and tonnage dues. This question has a history, but, strange to say, a history that is very little known by those most interested, and what little information the public is given upon it is mostly misinformation. The story has been so distorted by writers, who have most always written with a purpose, that I can not rely on text writers for an accurate statement of the facts of history; and consequently I have gone to the annals and records of Congress, made at the time when the history was writing itself, to get my facts.

By way of introduction, I will state some facts not disputed by anyone and generally known to all. Before the thirteen original British Colonies of America declared their independence they had begun in a small way to navigate the waters of the Atlantic and to carry their own commerce. They were hampered and restricted very considerably even then by the laws of Great Britain. When they obtained their independence after a long struggle, they were united only under the old Articles of Confederation, which were so lacking in cohesive power and authority that they were practically useless. These articles gave no power to the confederacy to regulate commerce either between the individual States or between them and foreign countries. The result was that the separate States were each an easy prey to the restrictive legislation of foreign countries, and more particularly of the mother country, Great Britain, the navigation laws of which imposed outrageous burdens and restrictions upon the ships and navigation of the States. During the Revolutionary War from necessity we had begun to manufacture, and had become to some extent a manufacturing as well as agricultural people. Of course, it was to the interest, or it seemed to nearsighted statesmanship, to be to the interest of older countries to keep down our manufacturing enterprises and our shipping enterprise also. In fact, at that time the philosophy of civil government seemed in all European countries and to a great extent here to rest upon the theory that each nation prospered in proportion as they could hamper and destroy the thrift and prosperity of every other people. Consequently all the old countries sought to build up their markets by exclusive privileges for themselves and burdensome restrictions upon others. So when we became an independent Nation, or 13 independent nations bound together by very feeble ties, we found ourselves, as to our foreign trade, in conflict with all the world, and all the world adopting restrictions and imposing burdens upon our merchant vessels.

For example, Great Britain imposed upon our ships discriminating tonnage dues by which a vessel of any of the States entering a British port was compelled to pay several times as much dues as were exacted from a British vessel entering the same port. And, in addition, her tariff laws levied one rate of duty upon goods brought into her ports in English vessels and a much higher rate of duty upon the same goods brought into the same port in a ship belonging to the States. The same thing was true of other nations.

The first thing that naturally suggests itself to the human mind in these conditions is retaliation. If England imposed discriminating tonnage dues and tariff rates on goods entering her ports in vessels of the States, why should not the States impose discriminating tonnage dues and taxes upon British vessels and goods imported in British vessels? That was the first idea that occurred to the different States, but the difficulty was that these States were several and there was no common or central authority which could act for them all and give them uniform laws of retaliation; and it was found that acting separately they could not act uniformly or effectively. This was because of the first law of human nature, which is selfishness or self-interest. On our eastern coast we had many fair ports which might be entered for purposes of trade by the vessels of all nations. These ports were all naturally and actively competitive ports, each seeking its own advantage in commerce; so then when the State of New York levied a given rate of tonnage dues and tariff taxes upon the ships of a foreign country and the goods brought in by its ships the State of Massachusetts or the State of Virginia or the State of Maryland could attract the trade of that foreign country by levying lower tonnage dues and tariff taxes. It was found in actual experience that because of this competition between the different States none of them could really retaliate by placing the same burdens upon foreign ships in our ports that foreign countries could and did place on our ships in their ports.

And so the matter stood, with our shipping suffering helplessly from the discriminating laws of foreign countries, until the Union was formed under the Constitution of 1787. This condition of our merchant marine formed one of the strong arguments for the adoption of the Constitution and the forming thereby of a more perfect union; and so one of the very first laws passed by the very first Congress that assembled was a retaliatory law imposing heavy discriminating tonnage dues and duties upon foreign ships entering all our ports and the cargoes therein, in excess of the tonnage dues and duties upon our own ships and cargoes imported in them. Under it we exercised restriction for restriction; we imposed burden for burden. It became a conflict of burdens and restrictions of the most vigorous and vicious character.

Fortunately for us, about that time the French Revolution began to disturb the commerce and shipping of England and France and all the Old World, so that while all overseas commerce and transportation was hampered and restricted by these discriminatory laws, we being neutrals, our shipping suffered less from war disturbances than did that of England or France or other European countries. Our shipping increased greatly, you might say it prospered wonderfully; and we find numberless text writers, who should have been students of the subject, attributing that increase and prosperity of our shipping to our then existing discriminating tonnage dues and duties, and utterly ignoring the world conditions under which our shipping at that time was prospered and increased. It will be observed that all this class of text writers, however, are advocates to-day either of ship subsidies or of discriminating duties, and they study history with a purpose of finding therein arguments favoring their pet policies, and naturally they ignore or minimize any fact that does not help their argument.

This policy of discrimination was not peculiar to Europeans, but was practiced in colonial times by the Colonies between themselves. The northern Colonies, however, at an early date wisely adopted reciprocity as to each other, but after their independence all the States had varying restrictions and discriminating duties on foreign ships. New York put double duties on goods imported in British vessels, whether they came in direct or through other States. The States had an abundance of discriminating tonnage laws, but no two of them were the same prior to the adoption of our present Constitution. Our act of 1789, the first congressional act on the subject, gave 10 per cent rebate of duties on goods in United States ships, which is in effect the pending bill, except that under this the shipper gets his rebate when he pays his income tax instead of when he pays his tariff tax, and this bill applies to dutiable and nondutiable goods and to exports as well as imports, and is therefore a far greater discrimination than the act of 1789. Our act of 1790 substituted a 10 per cent increase of duty on goods brought in foreign ships for the 10 per cent reduction when goods were imported in American ships. In 1804 an extra tonnage duty of 50 cents per ton was placed on foreign ships, and in 1812 this was increased to $1.50 per ton. Mr. Bates, a much-quoted text writer, who advocates the most drastic discriminating laws in favor of our shipping, says that in a few years after 1789 our vessels were carrying 80 to 90 per cent of our exports and imports, and he attributes this solely to the discriminating dues and duties. He forgets that that very year the French Revolution, in all its fury, broke out and the French King was imprisoned in Paris, and that a few years after that all Europe was afire, engaged in a death struggle, with England, Holland, Spain, Prussia, and Austria in coalition against France, and that the ships of all these nations encountered such danger of seizure and destruction as gave the ships of the United States, a neutral, every possible advantage, and that every shipper sought a neutral ship to avoid seizure.

He forgets that this condition continued, except for the brief period, when we were drawn into the maelstrom in our war with England, down to the peace treaty after the fall of Napoleon at Waterloo, June 18, 1815, and that all Europe was exhausted and disordered for years after that; at least he ignores these facts. He forgets or ignores the fact that during these years our ships had to carry our commerce, if it was carried at all. He says that the peak of our shipping was in 1826, when we carried 89.6 per cent of our exports and 95 per cent of our imports in our ships, and that our carrying fell to 72.1 per cent of our exports and 60 per cent of our imports in 1861. He is careful not to give the successive declines of our percentages in carrying, but lumps it and says it was in the period from 1826 to 1861, and then attributes it to our reciprocity laws and treaties alone.

The plain truth of history, as I shall show more fully later, is that our reciprocity policy began in 1815, just after we passed the reciprocity act of March 3, that year. Reciprocity had two phases or stages. The theory of total abolition of all discriminations was of slow growth. The act of March 3, 1815, only provided for eliminating discriminations as to ships carrying goods that were produced by the country to whom the ships belonged, and not to ships carrying the products of some other country. The former was called direct trade, the latter indirect trade.

The act of 1815 provided that as to ships engaged in direct trade we would abolish all discriminating duties and tonnage dues against ships of any nation which would abolish such discriminations as to our ships; but this did not affect the indirect trade—goods carried by one nation for another. It affected, however, perhaps three-fourths of the commercial shipments of the world.

Under this act of 1815 we began at once to negotiate treaties. Among the first of these was one with Great Britain in the same year, which did not include her colonies. We negotiated a great many treaties under this act of 1815. And by far the greater part of the burdens on our ships in foreign ports and burdens on foreign ships in our ports were eliminated, greatly to our advantage, as shown by the continued growth of our shipping.

But our people were not satisfied with reciprocity in direct trade only. We earnestly sought through treaty and legislation full reciprocity in both direct and indirect trade, and after many treaties we passed the general statute of February 26, 1829, which I will show later. If reciprocity was hurtful to our shipping, its baleful effects ought to have begun to show immediately after 1815. But in the ignorance and blindness of the statesmen of that day they thought it was a good thing, and they pursued it with persisting ardor, passing one law after another and making one treaty after another, all with the purpose of securing greater freedom of our ships from discriminatory burdens in foreign ports in exchange for freedom of foreign ships from discriminatory burdens in our ports.

We finally secured full and complete reciprocity with Great Britain, in direct and indirect trade, and in her colonial as well as her home ports in 1830, and our merchant marine continued to grow until 1861, although England, through her iron ships, began to gain on us in the fifties.

After 1815 the merchant marines of other countries, especially Great Britain, recovered from their stricken condition and grew also, so that they carried a greater percentage of their trade with us, which was natural and inevitable if they at all approached us in skill and ability as builders and operators of ships. I would submit a plain question. In normal times, under normal international trade relations, is not any great nation carrying its fair proportion of its export and import trade when it carries 72.1 per cent of the former and 60 per cent of the latter? Do we really hope or even care to do more? Yet that is what even Mr. Bates says we did after 35 years of fair competition. I will correct him by saying that we had had open, free, and fair competition with Great Britain in both direct and indirect trade only since 1830—that is to say, only 31 years—but that was surely long enough to test a policy.

Mr. Bates notes our further decline. He says that by the close of the Civil War in 1865 we carried only 26.1 per cent of our exports and 29.9 per cent of our imports, and that in 1901, a further period of 35 years, we carried only 6.13 per cent of our exports and 11.99 per cent of our imports. For all this decline he leaves the reader to infer that our reciprocity laws and treaties, which mean simply giving and receiving equal treatment, were the cause. He seems to know nothing of the War between the States or of anything else as a cause. With the blindness of a jaundiced advocate he hopes that his hearers or readers may be equally blind. And Mr. Bates furnishes a large percentage of the quotations of present-day advocates of discriminating duties in their distortion and perversion of history. I might add that recently some writers have attributed the prosperity of our merchant marine up to 1861 to some restrictions in laws affecting our fishing industries—a contention too ridiculous to answer.

It seems to me that the surest way to ascertain the good or evil effect of the laws in question upon our shipping and commerce is to study them through the eyes and minds of the statesmen and people of that day and time. The European wars ended by the peace of Paris in 1815. In fact they were supposed to have ended by the first treaty of Paris in 1814, but Napoleon's escape from Elba prolonged the agony till 1815, when the dangers to British shipping at sea were ended. Our own war with Great Britain ended in 1814. The shipping of the world became free in 1814–15, except for such shackles as were placed upon it by the lawmakers of the different nations—that is, it was free from war hazards. Beginning with that period I want to present the subject to you from the annals and records of Congress.

Committee reports bill (February 6, 1815) to repeal so much of several acts as impose discriminating tonnage between foreign vessels and United States vessels and discriminating duty between goods imported in foreign vessels and United States vessels. Bill read and passed to second reading.

Only just that brief statement.

Same bill read second time, February 21, 1815. (P. 257.)
Same bill read third time and passed, February 23, 1815. (P. 267.)
Yeas 24, nays 0, giving names voting.

STATEMENT.

So it was resolved unanimously that this bill pass and that the title thereof be, "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States."

HOUSE.

February 23, 1815. Notice from Senate that it had passed bill repealing discriminating duties. (Same noted, supra, p. 1186.)
February 24, 1815. Same bill read twice and referred to Ways and Means Committee. (P. 1191.)

Mr. Eppes, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate to repeal (in certain events) the discriminating duties now imposed on foreign tonnage and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, reported the same without amendment, and moved that it pass to a third reading. Mr. Seybert said this was a subject of great importance, in which his constituents, as much as any people of the United States, were interested; that it came into the House at too late a period of the session to be fully discussed and maturely considered; that, when heretofore the subject had been brought before the Congress, it had been opposed by petitions from various quarters, which would not now appear, because no such measure was expected to have been agitated at this session. He therefore moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely. Mr. Eppes hoped this motion would not prevail. It was true, on former occasions when this subject had been before the House it had excited some sensibility among the merchants, but this was a very different proposition from any which had before been agitated. The bill proposed to take off these countervailing duties when other nations shall adopt corresponding regulations. For his part, Mr. Eppes said he believed we were capable of building vessels as cheaply, perhaps more cheaply, than any country on earth, and such a regulation as was proposed, if reciprocal, would prove highly advantageous to our navigation, etc. Mr. Seybert interrupted Mr. Eppes by a withdrawal of his motion to postpone the bill, and it was, on motion of Mr. Eppes, committed to a Committee of the Whole.
March 3, 1815. Bill reported by Committee of Whole, ordered to third reading, read third time, passed by unanimous vote, and returned to Senate (p. 1267).
March 3, 1815. Bill as passed and approved (p. 1934):

An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, so far as the same respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ships or vessels may belong. Such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished. Approved March 3, 1815.

It will be observed that this act relates only to direct shipments—that is, to goods the product of the country to which the ship belonged. So ended this volume. The reasons given were that we could build and operate ships cheaper and better than other nations. Let me observe in passing that no nation has been greatly successful except for the same reasons. And during all the period of our great shipping supremacy our ships furnished to international commerce the cheapest unit of transportation.

Fourteenth Congress, first session (Senate), about the only thing I can find is (pages 1795 and 1796) a tariff raise act approved February 5, 1816, which carefully provides not to impair or affect the act of March 3, 1815. That part of the act is as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to contravene any provision of any commercial treaty or convention concluded between the United States and any foreign power or State; nor so as to impair or in any wise affect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States."
Passed on the 3d day of March, in the year 1815.
Approved February 5, 1816.

Fourteenth Congress, second session (House of Representatives, p. 275), December 13, 1816, Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Lowndes, introduced the following report and bill:

The Committee of Ways and Means, who have been instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," so far as it relates to duties on tonnage, report: That it appears, by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanies this report, that under the construction put by the Treasury Department upon "the act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage" the duty paid upon foreign vessels entering the ports of the United States has been $2 per ton, as well since as before the 30th of June last. The committee have no hesitation in recommending to the House a bill which will make the rate of duty upon the tonnage of vessels engaged in a trade which is open to American navigation the same as is provided by the act of July 20, 1790. By this act the duty upon vessels of the United States entering from a foreign port is 6 cents per ton; on vessels built within the United States after the 20th day of July, 1789, but belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign powers, 30 cents per ton; and on other vessels 50 cents per ton. This low rate of duty can not prudently be applied to vessels engaged in a trade between the United States and ports from which American tonnage is excluded.
The subject of such trade has been referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, and the second section of the bill proposed is intended only to continue it in the state in which it has been placed by the construction of the act of the last session, until that committee can have time to mature a more extensive and adequate remedy for the embarrassments of our navigation. The bill proposed contains a reference to the act of 1790 instead of a repetition of its enactments. A different course, though it might be more regular, would spread upon the statute book many minute provisions, which the passage of a navigation law, before the close of the session, might modify or repeal.

A bill supplementary to "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

Be it enacted, etc., That the tonnage duties to be paid by ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States, excepting, only, such foreign ships or vessels as shall be entered from any foreign port or place, to or with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, shall be the same as are provided by the act, entitled "An act imposing duties on the tonnage of ships or vessels," passed on the 20th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1790. Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights and privileges which have been, or may be, acquired by any foreign nation, under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty on tonnage of vessels.

Evidently referring to act of March 3, 1815, and treaties under it—

And be it further enacted, That on all foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States before the 30th day of June next, from any foreign port or place to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of $2 per ton. And the duties provided by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as are prescribed by law in relation to the duties upon tonnage now in force. The bill was committed.

December 23, 1816: Bill reported by Foreign Relations (p. 357):

An act concerning the navigation of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That after the — day of ——— no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture; or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation: Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which has not adopted, and which shall not adopt, a similar regulation of commerce.
SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and the ship or vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, and cargo shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions as have been heretofore established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws.
Mr. Forsyth, from the same committee, also reported a bill supplementary to the act regulating the duties on imports and tonnage, passed April 27, 1816. These two bills were twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

February 28, 1817. Instructions to report bill to continue last act, which was limited to June 30, 1816, thus continuing $2 per ton duty on ships from countries that exclude our ships (pp. 1040–1041).

These were, of course, mutually cutthroat retaliation laws.

February 28, 1817. Same bill reported by Committee of Whole (p. 1043).
March 1, 1817. Same bill passed House (p. 1045).
March 3, 1817. Message from Senate showing passage of act to continue in force act of March 3, 1815 (p. 1055).
March 3, 1817. Shows Senate bill was read twice and ordered to lie on table (p. 1057).

Seems to have finally passed (p. 1307):

An act to continue in force the second section of the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

Be it enacted, etc., That on all foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States after the 30th day of June next, from any foreign port or place, to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of $2 per ton, to be levied and collected in the same manner and under the same regulations as are prescribed by law in relation to the duties upon tonnage now in force.
Approved March 3, 1817.

For exact law, which is as follows (p. 1277):

An act supplementary to an act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the tonnage duties to be paid by ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States, excepting only such foreign ships or vessels as shall be entered from any foreign port or place to or with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, shall be the same as are provided by the act entitled "An act imposing duties on the tonnage of ships or vessels," passed on the 20th day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights and privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty on tonnage of vessels.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That on all foreign ships or vessels which shall be entered in the United States before the 30th day of June next, from any foreign port or place to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to go and trade, there shall be paid a duty at the rate of $2 per ton. And the duties provided by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner and under the same regulations as are prescribed by law in relation to the duties upon tonnage now in force.

Approved, January 14, 1817.

JAMES MADISON.

See especially Fifteenth Congress, first session, December 1, 1817, to April 20, 1818, pages 2584 and 2586, for retaliatory laws, as follows (p. 2584):

An act to continue in force, from and after the 30th of June, 1819, until the 30th of June, 1826, the fourth paragraph of the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth paragraph of the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," passed the 27th of April, 1816, shall, from and after the 30th of June, 1819, continue to operate in the same manner, and to have the same effect, until the 30th of June, 1826, that the above-mentioned fourth paragraph now has and will continue to have until the 30th of June, 1819, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, April 20, 1818.

An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of vessels in the ports of the United States as imposes a discriminating duty between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States is hereby repealed so far as respects vessels truly and wholly belonging to the subjects of the King of the Netherlands, such repeal to take effect from the time the Government of the aforesaid abolished the discriminating duties between her vessels and the vessels of the United States arriving in the ports or places aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the several acts imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, so far as the same respects the produce or manufactures of the territories, in Europe, of the King of the Netherlands, or such produce and manufactures as can only be, or most usually are, first shipped from a port or place in the kingdom aforesaid, the same being imported in vessels truly and wholly belonging to subjects of the King of the Netherlands; such repeal to take effect from the time the Government aforesaid abolished its discriminating duties between goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in vessels of the United States and vessels belonging to the nations aforesaid.

Approved April 20, 1818.

The clear purpose and purport of all these laws was to repeal discriminating dues and duties on vessels of countries which abolished such discrimination against our ships in our direct trade with those countries and tighten our laws against those excluding us.

Mr. Forsyth's report (p. 866) of February 9, 1818, is as follows:

COLONIAL TRADE.

Mr. Forsyth, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the commercial intercourse of the United States with the British West India Islands, North American Colonies, and the petitions of sundry inhabitants of different parts of the District of Maine, upon the subject of the said intercourse, made a report, which was read; when Mr. Forsyth reported a bill, supplementary to the act, regulating duties on imports and tonnage, passed the 27th of April, 1816, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to the commercial intercourse of the United States with the British West India Islands and North American Colonies, and also the petition of the inhabitants of the different parts of the District of Maine, on the same subject, report: That, by the statement marked A, annexed to this report, it appears that the average amount of duties upon merchandise annually imported into the United States from the British West India Islands and North American colonial possessions from 1802 to 1816, excluding the period from the commencement of the restrictive system to the termination of the late war, exceeds $2,000,000. The value of this merchandise, upon which these duties accrued, is supposed to be equal to $7,000,000 per annum. The statement B shows that the average annual amount of exports to the same places, principally of domestic production, up to 1817, excluding the time of the operation of the restrictive system and the continuance of the war, have exceeded $6,500,000. The statement C shows that in the year 1815 the amount of duties on merchandise imported in American vessels from the British West India Islands and North American colonial possessions was, to the amount of duties on merchandise imported in British vessels, as one to four; in 1816, as one to five and a half, or two to eleven. Taking the ratio of 1816 as the basis of calculation, and it is believed to afford the safest and most solid, as past experience shows a constant diminution of the amount of duties on goods imported in vessels of the United States, it is estimated, supposing the same proportion exists in the exports, that American vessels are used in the transportation annually of $2,177,924 worth of merchandise, and British vessels $11,322,076 worth of the most bulky articles of commerce, one-half of which are the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States. This inequality in the advantages of this commerce, to the injury of the navigating interests of this country, arises from the rigorous enforcement of the colonial system of Great Britain as to the United States, while it is relaxed to all other nations who are friendly to the British Empire and have colonial possessions.

"The portion of the commerce which is carried on in American vessels arises from accidental and temporary suspensions of the system which the governors of the islands, etc., are permitted, under the pressure of dire necessity, to direct—an employment for our seamen and vessels precarious and momentary, rather irritating and tantalizing than profitable. This intercourse appears to the committee in the worst possible state, as it regards the navigation of the United States while it is in the best for that of Great Britain. Justice and policy require on the part of every wise government its best exertions to secure to its own citizens a perfect equality in the transportation of merchandise with the people of every nation, respectively, with whom it has commercial intercourse. Some governments are governed by a policy more contracted, desiring to give to their navigators the exclusive transportation of their native products, while they desire to participate in carrying the production of other countries. The committee are satisfied that the United States will never be governed by the selfish views of the latter class, but trust that it has not been, nor will it ever be, regardless of the just motives of the former. So far it is a duty to protect the navigating interest. This duty can be performed in relation to the subject of this report or by a conventional stipulation with Great Britain, formed upon the basis of reciprocity or by legislative acts, operating exclusively against the British navigator engaged in this trade. With the first mode this House has no further concern than to know that the other branch of the Government has performed its duty. Repeated and hitherto unavailing applications have been made to the British Government. It is not, however, surprising that they have been unsuccessful, since no adequate motive at present exists to induce Great Britain to arrange this intercourse by convention. The offer contained in the articles annexed to this report, the most rational and reciprocally advantageous of any ever made, may be considered as dictated by a spirit of accommodation, which, under the pressure of adequate motives, might be fostered into a determination to grant all that we could reasonably ask or they be expected to yield.

"The first three articles, with some practicable modifications, by the adaptation of our commercial laws to the stipulations contained in them, confining the commerce strictly to those articles which Americans were permitted to carry, would place the trade upon as favorable grounds as could be expected. It would, no doubt, in a short time be followed by a complete abandonment of the residue of the present jealous system of exclusion. The committee can not, however, but approve the prompt rejection of this proposition, since these articles are connected with another altogether inadmissible, without a departure from what they deem the settled policy of this country in relation to the trade with the Indians within its jurisdiction. The British ministry having assured the Government that these articles were all that could be granted consistent with their opinions of the best interest of the British Empire there is no longer any hope of effecting this desirable object by negotiation. It remains for Congress to determine what course is to be pursued. If it were possible to separate the interest of one class of the community from that of another, it must be obvious that, however fatal to the navigator, the present state of things is not injurious to the cultivator of the soil. The productions of his labor are carried with facility to a ready market, and he receives in return all those articles which taste and habit have rendered necessary to his comfort. But this separation is impossible and the necessary connection between the two interests is apparent when it is remembered that the competition of American with foreign navigation is essential to keep down the expense of transportation, always paid by the cultivator and consumer. If this injury is not now apparent, it will ultimately be felt, when the total ruin of the navigating interest will deprive us of the power to remedy the evil."

All this in days happy of discriminating duties.

"The committee forbear to press those important considerations of preparation for national defense so inseparably connected with this inquiry. They feel that there is on this point but one sentiment among the Representatives of the people and in the Nation. Experience, prudence, gratitude for the glory shed upon our country, and the confidence and delightful anticipation of future renown all conspire to insure the necessary sacrifices for the preservation and interest of the seamen of the United States. * * * The only remaining question to be examined as to the mode of effecting this desirable result: By total prohibition of all intercourse or by burdensome charges on the trade, if confined to British vessels?"

This report does not seem to harmonize with Mr. Bates's statements which I have quoted. It shows that under discriminating duties the British were faring better than we. The condition described by Mr. Forsyth did not improve but grew worse up to 1826, so that I doubt Mr. Bates's percentage figures for that period. In the discussion had in Congress between 1815 and 1830 there are many speeches that make one doubt Mr. Bates's figures.

At second session, Fifteenth Congress, I find on February 27, 1819, an effort to pass a bill extending tonnage reciprocity to Prussia was defeated because she would not extend it to us. But later an act was passed extending to vessels from Hamburg and Bremen the benefit of existing reciprocity laws—that is, acts of April 20, 1818, and March 3, 1815—until January 1, 1824. This seems to have been simply an attempt to induce Prussia to abandon her discriminations against our ships. The annals of the first session of the Sixteenth Congress devotes a good many pages to discussions and memorials on the subject of discriminations against us by other nations, but I have found no law at that session altering existing law as to discriminating dues. On December 27, 1819, a memorial was presented from the Chamber of Commerce of New York showing injurious consequences of discriminating duties lately imposed by France, and praying specially that heavy tonnage duty be imposed on French shipping in our ports for the protection of our shipping and commerce. At the second session of this Congress many protests are filed against French discriminations and against our own high tariffs, but no change of law seems to have been made.

The Seventeenth Congress, first session, simply passed an act continuing in force existing laws on the tonnage subject, and making permanent the law of March 3, 1815—the law tendering reciprocity to all countries.

In the Eighteenth Congress, on December 29, 1823, discussing a bill to continue certain acts—the act of March 3, 1815, and others of like tenor—Mr. Smith, of Maryland, from the Committee of Finance of the Senate, used this language:

About the year 1801 the subject was brought forward in Congress, and the necessity of doing away with all countervailing duties, by admitting on terms of reciprocity the vessels of all nations who were willing to adopt the same policy in regard to us, was explained. But the attempt did not succeed; people could not be made to extend their views to the time when the European wars should cease, and the nations left free to retort upon us for our discriminating system. But at last the peace of Amiens took place, and that event opened the eyes of our people. It showed us that British ships would get all the employment, while we retained our discriminating law. War again commenced, and so long as it continued our system did us no harm. But when peace again returned it was soon found what would be the result of our policy. It was in 1815 that the act passed repealing all discriminating duties on the vessels of those nations which would admit ours on terms of reciprocity.

Volumes 41 and 42, page 3193, shows among laws passed at first session of Eighteenth Congress an act which provides that after January 1, 1824, discriminating duties are suspended as to certain countries named in direct trades so long as they reciprocate, and no longer.

In Senate, page 758, notes a message from the House showing that the House had passed a bill to revive and continue the act of March 3, 1815.

Page 1099 of same volume shows House action on same bill, January 20, 1824.

These references are made simply to show that during these years, when Mr. Bates is claiming our discriminating duties were such a blessing, the policy of our Government and Congress was uniformly, earnestly, and insistently seeking reciprocity.

In the House, March 15, 1824. First session, Eighteenth Congress, page 1789. Mr. Brick offered a resolution, and so forth, to inquire and report whether any law exists in contravention of provisions of convention of July 3, 1815, with Great Britain, and into the expediency of countervailing by law any duties on American tonnage which Great Britain may lay contrary to terms of said convention.

Volume 1, Congressional Debates, second session, Eighteenth Congress, begins December 6, 1824, nothing noted.

Volume 2, first session, Nineteenth Congress, begins December 5, 1825:

JANUARY 25, 1826.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following bill, reported by the Committee on Commerce in addition to an act entitled "An act concerning discriminating duties on tonnage and impost:

"Be it enacted, etc., That upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the Government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost, to the disadvantage of the United States, are imposed or levied in the ports of the said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are and shall be suspended and discontinued so far as respects the vessels of the said foreign nation, and the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported into the United States in the same from the said foreign nation or from any other foreign country; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States and their cargoes as aforesaid shall be continued and no longer."

This seems to be the first full and free abandonment of discriminating duties on imports both direct and indirect shipments on account of their being imported in foreign ships of any country that would reciprocate. Its discussion is illuminating. This is what Mr. Bates calls the end of discriminating duties and the beginning of the end of our merchant marine. Please note that this bill did not abolish our discriminating duties except as to nations which abolished their discriminating duties as to us, and as a matter of fact this reciprocal end of discriminations did not take place between us and our greatest competitor in transportation, Great Britain, at that time nor until our treaty with that country in 1830. (P. 70:)

Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, said the object of the bill was to clothe the Executive with the authority to proffer to any foreign nation who would reciprocate the same liberal conditions to the United States an entire equality of commercial intercourse; in other words, that the vessels and merchandise of foreign powers agreeing to this condition should be admitted into the ports of the United States on precisely the same terms and be subjected to no other or higher rates of duty, whether of tonnage or of impost, than the vessels and cargoes of the citizens of the United States. This, it would be perceived, when acceded to, amounted to a complete removal of the system of discriminating duties with the parties agreeing to it. The report, he said, which had been made by the Committee of Commerce, laid on the tables of the Members of the Senate would give the general reasoning on the subject, and more especially would the minute statements accompanying it furnish precise data on which gentlemen could correctly form their opinions as to the expediency of adopting the course of policy recommended and of passing or rejecting the bill. Most gladly he said he would leave the subject on this ground, but he had been informed in the position in which he stood, as chairman of the committee, that something more was expected from him, and that other elucidations of the bill should be given.

These expectations he would endeavor, then, as briefly as in his power, to comply with, and, in doing it, attempt to trace the origin, progress, and effect of the discriminating duties, adverting, in his remarks, to three or four more marked eras in the commercial history of the United States; showing the relative amount of the foreign trade at the different periods referred to; the proportion of it enjoyed by the citizens of the United States and that part of it occupied by foreign navigation; also, the present state of this trade—January, 1826—and the amount of it exhibited at the date of the latest returns from the Treasury Department in 1824. He would then advert to the effect to be produced by the passing of the bill, on the commerce of this and other countries, and leave it to the better judgment of the Senate for its decision. The discriminating duties, he said, were coeval with the Government, being among the first acts after its adoption; the effect was salutary and beneficent in a high degree; at this time the navigation of the United States was in not only a depressed but nearly a prostrate state. We had, before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, scarcely recovered from the impoverishment and exhaustion of the war for independence; we had no common head to protect our rights or property in foreign countries; alien duties abroad were laid on our navigation, which we had no power to retaliate; for, if one State retaliated these duties, and the others did not follow her example, her situation was only changed from bad to worse—as it drove the little foreign trade she might have from her ports to those of the States where no duty was imposed. The consequence was, we could not compete with foreign navigators; they taxed our vessels but we could not tax theirs; and this inequality was decisive against us; the consequence in a little while would have been that the whole, or nearly the whole, carrying trade of the United States, even for our own products, would have been in the hands of foreign navigators.

At this period the Federal Government was most happily adopted, and the discriminating duties were imposed; the effect was electrical; the merchants and navigators of the United States saw the whole revenue of enactions of the Government based upon the interest with which they were most nearly connected; they felt they had a Government, not only able but willing, to protect them; and that the countervailing duties would place them in some degree on a footing with other nations—from this moment the navigation and commerce of the United States most rapidly expanded, increasing in a ratio unexampled in the records of any other people. In 1789 the whole tonnage employed in the foreign commerce of the United States was only 234,000 tons, of which more than 100,000 was in foreign navigation; but in the short space of 17 or 18 years the tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States had swelled to no less an amount than 1,200,000 tons, giving an increase, in this short space, of more than five-fold, of which not nearly one-half, as in 1789, was in foreign navigation, but only 86,000 tons, out of 1,200,000 tons; giving an increase of the American tonnage nine times over—it having increased during this time from about 120,000 tons to 1,100,000 tons. This was the second period to which he should allude. But this highly gratifying state of prosperity for the commerce and navigation of the United States, he could not contend, arose exclusively, or principally, from the imposition of discriminating duties; nor did it arise mainly from them; it arose from other and more powerful causes; from the political events of the times; from the wars of the French Revolution, which soon followed—which continued for 20 years, embracing in their vortex within that time all the navigating States of Europe, deranging and overturning their commercial systems, and, when engaged in war, sweeping all their shipping from the ocean, with the single exception of Great Britain, whose naval preponderance enabled her to protect her mercantile marine. In this state of things, the commerce of the world was almost entirely thrown into the hands of American merchants and shipowners; and this, to the greater extent, was the source from which the unexampled success of American commerce and American navigation had arisen.

Mr. Lloyd then calls attention to the act of March 3, 1815, and to the treaty with Great Britain, made in July, 1815, abolishing discriminating duties between the two countries in the direct trade. This, he said, was the period when the first suspension of discriminating duties had taken place. The convention was for four years. In 1818 it was renewed for 10 years, and is now—1826—in existence. In 1818 a treaty of the same kind and for the same period was formed with Sweden. The principle has been extended by diplomatic arrangements with Russia, Prussia, Norway, Oldenburg, the Hanse towns, France, and Sardinia, and negotiations are pending with other European countries and the South American States with the same end in view. The result, he says, in general terms—shows that on a fair field and clear stage your merchants and navigators on equal terms are able to compete with any nation on the face of the earth.

And this notwithstanding he had shown in another part of his remarks that our wages were about one-third higher than British. He then showed that with reciprocity we carried of our trade with Great Britain five-sixths, with France nine-tenths, with the Hanse towns two-thirds, and so forth. So that reciprocity in direct trade, largely prevailing before 1826, had not resulted disastrously, as Mr. Bates says; but favorable results to us were perhaps the cause of Great Britain restricting our trade with her colonies by discriminations which it was the work of our statesmen to get removed. After showing these facts and figures Mr. Lloyd said it remained to show what the effect of a wider or perfect and complete reciprocity would be on our shipping.

Nineteenth Congress, first session, debates, volume 2, Senate, page 576, April 18, 1826, shows memorial of certain shipowners and manufacturers of Baltimore:

That Great Britain had lately opened the trade of her North American and West India Colonies on far more favorable terms to the rest of the world than to the merchants of the United States, and they therefore urge our abolition of discriminating dues and duties against these Colonies, etc.

The committee reported showing that the adjustment of intercourse between the United States and British colonial possessions was committed to our minister at the court of London and that negotiations were expected to come to a definite issue before the next session of Congress, and therefore they opposed any legislation at that time. Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Smith, of Maryland, discussed the question. Mr. Smith said he believed there was no difference of opinion; that all who had studied the subject agreed that our discriminating duties ought to be repealed as far as they related to the subject before them—the British colonial trade; that the only difference was as to the manner; that the Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, and the President, Mr. Adams, were of same opinion. The Committee on Commerce thought it ought to be done by negotiations. Others thought it ought to be done by legislation, meeting the liberal act of Parliament of July 5, 1825. Mr. Smith thought so. He discussed the heavy burdens our shipping was bearing by reason of discriminating duty. Mr. Tazewell agreed with Mr. Smith.

During this discussion Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, exhibited a statement where a small lumber-loaded vessel of the United States paid charges before she got out of port more than double the original cost of the entire cargo. Briefly, the whole discussion showed that up to that time, April 18, 1826, there had been great and burdensome restrictions between the United States and Great Britain, and all parties here wanted, in the words of Mr. Lloyd, "an open and equal trade." This, he said, was particularly true of shipping interest and all farmers and others who produced export goods. No farmer in America who understands it will ever consent to return to discriminating duties in 1922.

In 1827, second session, Nineteenth Congress, the Committee on Commerce were introducing a bill to exempt Swedish and Norwegian vessels from discriminating duties. This was done to take the place of a 10-year treaty negotiated in 1816, which had expired. Mr. Tomlinson, for the bill, said that the King of Sweden and Norway was observing the terms of the treaty, though expired, and that the course to be pursued by the United States was plain; that it ought to reciprocate the friendly conduct of the King till the treaty could be renewed.

Twentieth Congress begins December 3, 1827. Debates, volume 4, page 237, February 6, 1828. Mr. Woodbury, of New Hampshire, in the Senate recalls—to their minds the history and present condition of our discriminating duties.

He says that prior to 1815 the duties on American vessels coming from abroad were 6 cents per ton; on foreign vessels, 50 cents per ton on the vessel and 10 per cent additional impost on cargo. That since 1804 these last have been subject also to 50 cents per ton light money, thus making a discrimination of 44 cents per ton without, and 94 cents per ton with, light money on the ship and 10 per cent on the cargo. Since March 3, 1815, the discrimination remains the same, except in certain cases and certain nations, which he particularizes at great length, referring to many treaties and amendments of the law of March 3, 1815, and showing that in many and important particulars discriminations still exist between domestic and foreign vessels, especially those of France and Britain. The pending act, he says, proposes to do away with the whole of these remaining discriminations. Arguing for the bill, he shows that it was greatly to our pecuniary interest, since our ships and our cargoes paid to foreign countries more under these discriminations than foreign ships and cargoes paid to us, and that this was true because we exported more than we imported, and because our ships then carried more of our trade than foreign ships did—a condition we hope to see return. Of course, if we expect to export but little and to carry but little of our foreign trade, we can, with profit to our exchequer, lay as heavy discriminating duties and burdens as we choose on the shipping of other countries, and if our import tax is not high enough this further burden on imports will help protection further. He says:

It has been suggested, in opposition to the extension still further of the policy of 1815, to all kinds of merchandise whatever, that since the year 1815 our foreign tonnage has declined, and the decline might be attributed to the introduction of that policy. But a moment's consideration will show that here, as in many other cases, events following each other in date are not connected as cause and effect. Our foreign tonnage in the year 1816 was, to be sure, 1,300,000, and is now, or was in 1825, only about 1,055,446. But it is not to be forgotten that in 1816 foreigners enjoyed 258,000 tons, or one-fifth of the whole; while in 1825 they enjoyed only 95,000 tons, or about one-tenth of the whole. So that the American tonnage in the foreign trade is now in a proportion nearly double to what it was then. The decline then is not comparative, neither is it from the removal of the discriminating duties; but it undoubtedly has arisen from the long peace in Europe, which naturally diminishes our exports, and from the circumstance that, as the many old vessels in 1816 cease to be seaworthy, they have been supplied by smaller vessels in the coasting trade, where their employment could be more profitable. As proof of this the coasting trade, including all enrolled and licensed tonnage, has risen, from 1815 to 1825, over 200,000 tons, or from 513,833 to 722,323 tons. Indeed, in 1816 it was only 571,458 tons, while it now exceeds considerably all our tonnage engaged in the foreign trade. But we not only want the discrimination removed abroad, wherever it still exists on our products, freighted in our own vessels, because our products transported are much more valuable in amount than theirs in their vessels; but because ours, being necessaries of life and raw materials, will always hereafter be much surer in demand than theirs as mere luxuries of life or manufactures for which we at home are able generally to furnish substitutes. A very direct tendency of the present measure will also be to relieve our present exports of foreign products, amounting in 1825 to $32,590,643 and in 1826 to $24,539,612, from that discriminating duty which does not come within the scope of the act of 1815 or 1824, and which has never been removed abroad, reciprocally, to any great extent, except by recent treaties with Central America, Denmark, the Hanseatic Republics, and Sweden.

By those treaties, as before named, every species of discrimination, whether on vessels or merchandise of any kind, is entirely abolished. These exports of foreign articles, if burdened with only 10 per cent increased duty, equal to what is now imposed here in like cases, would expose us abroad to an annual tax of over $2,000,000, while the same increased duty on the amount of all kind of imports here, in foreign vessels, would be only about $400,000. Should we in this country extend the period of drawbacks and adopt more extensively the warehouse system, as now contemplated, it will become still more useful to us to assort the cargoes of our vessels to all nations without encountering, as to any part of those cargoes, either prohibitions or discriminations. The removal of every unequal and odious distinction will promote harmony in our foreign intercourse.

He then shows that, with islands belonging to England, trade with which was natural and profitable, we had at that time total prohibitions by means of which over 100,000 tons of our shipping had been diverted from that trade in the last year. We were then actually carrying between countries on the Mediterranean and ambitious to spread our ships over the world in fair competition, and, said Mr. Smith, of Maryland, when the obstructions to British colonial trade were removed, we should be able to go all over the world. The debate was engaged in by many Senators—all approving it—and the bill was engrossed without a division.

Volume 5, page 308, February 4, 1829. House considered a bill to repeal all tonnage duties on United States ships and ships of countries reciprocating. This was to get rid of the 6 cents per ton dues imposed on our ships and all other ships every time they entered any of our ports. This was shown to be unequal and burdensome on our coasting vessels, which paid it many times on a single round trip. But the bill on February 6, 1829, was laid on the table by a tie vote, the Speaker voting in the affirmative. On February 26, 1829, it was taken up again and passed.

Andrew Jackson became President on March 4, 1829. The Encyclopedia Americana says his foreign policy was firm and successful. The dispute with Great Britain over the northeastern boundary and the trade between the United States and British colonies, and so forth, were dealt with shrewdly and with success. I have tried to find that treaty and failed, but I am sure it was through Jackson that full reciprocity in direct and indirect trade and in her colonial trade was reached with Great Britain in 1830.

It may be that commercial warfare hereafter, like military warfare, is to be a conflict of the whole peoples instead of those only on the front or firing line; that not the nation which can furnish the best and cheapest unit of transportation but the one whose people as a whole can pay the biggest subsidies will do the carrying of the world. Whenever it is acknowledged that our merchantmen and shipbuilders are permanently incapable of meeting the other nations of the world in fair, open, and equal competition, our merchant marine must disappear from the overseas trade or our Nation as a whole must come to the point of giving subsidies to enable our ship-operating princes to furnish cheap service to the foreign and American shipper.

If American ship operation does actually cost more, a subsidy sufficient to equalize the unit cost will not satisfy the subsidy hunters, but, like the tariff beneficiaries, they will want a margin for an assured profit and royal official salaries.

It is a prospect not pleasing to contemplate. But discriminating laws in favor of our ships are worse, because they mean a warfare as desolating commercially as was the German war physically, and it is not to be thought of that we, the Government of the United States, shall plunge the world into such a commercial war. We know that if we did we as a Nation would merit the curse, just as Germany has merited it, of the civilized world. There are three courses we may pursue. First, we may try honest, fair, and equal competition in building and operating ships, putting back of the effort all of the skill, industry, resources, and genius of our builders, seamen, operators, and merchants. Second, we may retire from the contest and let the foreigner carry our goods, as we did during the 50 years prior to 1914. Third, we may try to sustain our merchant marine by taxation upon the whole of our people in the form of stupendous and ever-increasing subsidies. I prefer the first course, and, fortunately, we are more favorably circumstanced now for pursuing that course than we ever have been since 1861

After a long fight we have given our shipbuilders free raw materials, free iron and steel material, and we have found that instead of builders getting their iron and steel from England or other countries as the protected iron producers protested they would they have gotten it all here, and our iron and steel producers have demonstrated that they can easily compete with their strongest competitor, Great Britain. Many of our shipbuilders have always claimed that they could compete with Great Britain if they had free iron and steel, so that their raw material would cost them no more than it cost their competitors. We persistently refused to give it to them on account of the opposition of the iron manufacturers until 1914. Then we gave it to them with the result which I have stated. They have it now. Much of the cost of our ships comes from complicated and expensive machinery, and our manufacturers of machinery have shown that in almost every line they can hold their own in the markets of the world. The oil burner and the Diesel engine are effecting as great a revolution in shipping now as the displacement of wooden by iron ships did in the fifties of the last century. The economies effected by this new fuel and machinery in operation and cargo space and greater speed and quicker turn around are marvelous, and it will take a long time for the other nations of the world to junk their existing coal-burning fleets, while we can fairly start with the new era. If we only have the courage and patriotism to ignore the protests of our shipbuilders and make them compete by putting their product on the free list and letting the American operator buy his ship where he can buy it cheapest, we shall see the best of our shipyards not only survive but build the best and cheapest ships, and their product will be sold not only to the American but to every nation of the world. Circumstances favor us again here. We have on hand already built enough tonnage to supply our own wants and perhaps more than supply it for many years. Our shipyards must build for the world or quit. During this forced period of competition they will find their strength and ability as they never would do and never will do so long as they are given the assured tonnage of all the ships under the American flag whatever the cost or price of their ships may be.

I would therefore, were it left to me, open up the sale of our great ship tonnage now owned by the Government to the ship buyers of all countries. All our shipyards ought to favor this proposition so as to sell these ships before they are shelf worn and give the yards a chance to build more for ourselves as well as for other countries. When our shipbuilders build for us and for others, they will have a greater volume of business than they can ever have building for us alone; but, more than that, they will, if our merchantmen are permitted to buy where they will, sell ships to our people and for our flag as cheaply as they do to foreigners. And that will remove the great handicap that destroyed our merchant marine. For 50 years prior to 1914 all the ships under the American flag cost from 40 to 100 per cent more than the same kind of ships under the British flag. That is an undisputed fact, and that fact rendered it impossible that there could be any American merchant marine in the overseas trade. I have demonstrated that more than once on the floor of this House and am ready to do it now if anyone disputes the statement. Again, we are fortunate at this time, because our Government wishes to get out of the ship operating business, and she can sell, and is ready to sell, 10,000,000 tons of merchant shipping at the lowest world prices, so that the handicap of doing business in more costly ships than our competitors is gone for at least 10 years. If it be a fact that the wages of our crew and officers is higher than those of the British crew and officers, that fact will prove a mere trifle in our competitive enterprise, because the total labor cost is not more than 8 to 12 per cent of the whole cost of operating an American coal burning ship. And even that percentage will be lessened by the use of oil burners and the Diesel engine, and when this class of ships come in competition with coal burners, which constitute the bulk of foreign shipping, the percentage of labor cost to whole cost will be less on our ships than theirs. The loss in shipping comes from lack of cargo, slow voyage, slow loading, slow turn around. The profit comes from full cargo, quick voyage, and quick turn around. In these things the American merchant and ship operator if they pull together can best the world. We must make our banking and merchant connections and agencies abroad and our marine insurance equal to the best, and we must have incoming as well as outgoing cargoes. Given these things, the success of our merchant marine is sure. Without them its failure is sure.

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION FOR CERTAIN CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES.

In accordance with its previous motion the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, with Mr. MCARTHUR in the chair.

The bill was reported by title.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. In 1918, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, at the height of the war the Congress thought, on account of the high cost of living, that some contribution should be made by the Government to the employees of the Government, and in the year 1918 legislation was enacted in various bills which gave from 5 to 10 per cent increase in the compensation of the employees, and this increased compensation only applied to salaries up to $1,800. It was 10 per cent on all compensation below $1,200 and 5 per cent on salaries between $1,200 and $1,800.

The total cost of the Government contribution in the form of what is now known to be a bonus for that year was $11,400,000; and that was in the middle of the war when the living cost was at its height. For the fiscal year 1919 the practice of carrying a temporary bonus in the form of a percentage was abandoned and a flat rate of contribution amounting to $120 per annum was made, and that applied to all salaries below $2,500, including $2,500, and the total cost of that for 1919 was $18,000,000.

In 1920, two years after the war closed, the Congress in its generosity voted a further contribution of $240 per annum to all employees receiving $2,500 and less, and the total cost of that to the taxpayers of the country amounted to $53,600,000.

In 1921 we continued the $240 bonus. The bonus law always provided that all employees of the Government whose wages were fixed by wage boards should not be included in the privilege granted under the act, and that included all navy yard employees and other employees of a like character throughout the country. But notwithstanding the law, the Secretary of the Navy that year extended the bonus to all the Navy employees in violation of the law, and it cost the Government $14,000,000 in addition to what the law provided, and it increased the outgo from the Treasury to $64,200,000 and paid those employees two bonuses instead of one.

The law has never contemplated the payment of a bonus to any of these wage-board or lump-sum-appropriation employees of the Government. They are not included in this bill, and we do not want it understood that this bill provides a bonus for every person on the Government pay roll. So you gentlemen who live in navy yard districts and arsenal territory who may have friends on the pay roll there must not forget that any vote to increase this bonus—that is, the proposition recommended by the committee—will not add a dollar to the pay of any of the employees that work in those places, for they do not get it now, and they have never received it except in the case before referred to. Now we pass along to 1922, when the Committee on Appropriations, in making up the appropriations for 1922, the fiscal year now about to close, changed the situation as it existed as the result of the order issued by the Secretary of the Navy, and we cut the figures for 1922 by $24,000,000, so that this is not the first cut by any manner of means; so that the cost of the bonus as paid for 1922 will amount to about $40,800,000.

At the beginning of the consideration of the pending bill for the fiscal year 1923 I wanted to be sure that we did no injustice to anybody, and I took the precaution of asking the Secretary of Labor to make a report to the committee as to what the level of living cost is to-day as compared with the living cost in 1920; and his report shows that all over the United States the living cost has gone down 23 per cent; to be exact, 22.9 per cent. All the elements are taken into consideration in the determination of the reduction of costs; they include rent, furniture, clothing, food, heat, light, everything that goes into the living cost.

It was always understood that this bonus was no part of the salary of anybody working for the Government. It was understood to be the Government's contribution to the employee to help provide against the higher cost of living, due to the abnormal conditions of the country. That being the case, because it must be clear to everybody that when we began to pay this we began at the highest peak of living cost in 1918——

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not want to yield now. I want to make this statement: We only paid then 10 per cent on the wage up to $1,200, which was $60, and 5 per cent above $1.200, up to $1,800; and we increased that, not because of any abnormal conditions that have obtained since that time but because of pressure that has been brought from time to time that induced the Congress to vote the higher amount.

If this was intended, as I believe it was, to be a contribution to the living cost and to be no part of the basic pay, what is there more just than to conclude that when the living cost goes down the contribution shall go down to meet it? This contribution recommended now by the Committee on Appropriations is $180. That which was made for the current fiscal year was $240. If the $180 recommendation of the committee is adopted, it will make the annual cost for 1923, $28,335,880, or a reduction from the present cost of about $12.000.000.

But I may say in passing that about $3,000,000 of this $12,000,000 is due to the fact that the number of people entitled to the bonus in the Veterans' Bureau will be 16,800, according to the law, instead of 28,000, which they recommend as entitled to the bonus. When the Veterans' Bureau was organized it took over the vocational training forces and all the people on the pay roll under the Vocational Training Bureau, and the compensation of those people was fixed by wage boards and they never have been entitled to the bonus. But, notwithstanding that, the Veterans' Bureau recommended them for the bonus on this occasion. But the committee, looking over the facts in the case, decided that they were not entitled to it, and we have not provided for them in the bill. So that if you take the $3,000,000 deducted from the proposed expenditure to the employees in the Veterans' Bureau from the $12,000,000 which we propose to deduct as the difference between $180 and $240, we have $9,000,000 of a saving to the Treasury.

In reaching the conclusion that this should be done, we were not unmindful of the merits of the people who are drawing the bonus. We realized as well as anybody can that they are all worthy employees of the Government, performing the duties assigned them in a meritorious way, but we also realized that there is another side to this question, and that is the side that affects the taxpayers. In the consideration of great problems like this are we to consider only one side of the question? Is our judgment to be based entirely upon the demands of those on the Government pay roll or are we to give consideration to the man on the farm, who is not on the Government pay roll but who pays the tax to meet the burden? If you do not want to take into account the rights of the man who pays the taxes, you will vote for $240. I understand such an amendment will be offered. If you do want to take him into consideration, you will vote for $180. Of course, your conscience will tell you what you ought to do. We are supposed to be here to speak for 110,000,000 people. Our job is to do justice to all and to play favorites with none. It may be unpopular with the man who is on the pay roll to cut part of his income off, but does anybody ever think how unpopular it would be to add more to the tax of the man who has no Government income? Shall we consider him as a part of the Nation or shall we consider no element in the equation except the man who is on the pay roll? I admit that the man on the pay roll is always a very active force. He is bound to get his case before you, and it may be that the unfortunate taxpayer, who has no respite from the daily duties that begin before the sun rises and end only after the sun has set, has no time to write you to present his side of the case; but you know we are not elected entirely by the Government employees.

I am willing to admit that they are an active force, but if nobody except the Government employees in your district voted for you you would not be here. Of course you will all admit that. [Laughter.] Because it takes a few more votes even than we have Government employees on the pay roll to elect the Members of Congress. They are not all on the pay roll yet. But somewhere in America, sitting by the fireside on a winter evening, with prattling children upon the knees of the father and the mother, and the grandfather and the grandmother sitting in the most comfortable chairs, they read the story of the attitude of Congress. They do not have time to read it in summer. They are too busy making a living, too busy trying to store up the food they need for winter, and so they may forget now to call on you and me to urge economy. But while they forget during the working hours of these long days to tell you what they want, let us not forget them. We should be here to think about them once in a while. Remember that a vote for a $240 bonus means that you are taking $9,000,000 from the pockets of these people next year. Will you do it? Too many of them receive less than those for whom you are proposing to vote the $240, but you are proposing to saddle them with more burdens. Our business is to be just. Nobody is more desirous to be just than I am. I want to treat both sides fairly. We have a classification act pending in the Senate. The Senate ought to pass it. I can not criticize them for not having done it, but we have done our duty here. We have proved to these people on the Government pay roll that we are in favor of giving them a respectable compensation for their services, and I verily believe it would be a good thing for them if we took the bonus away from them altogether. Now, why do I say that? I say it because I believe it would force them to force the Senate to action. They would then realize more than ever the necessity for the legislation for reclassification; but as long as you keep them fed up with the reclassification without reclassification, by giving them a bonus, they will be asleep at the switch and there will be inequity in the case. As it is to-day in the departments of the Government, some people are getting a good deal more than they ought to get and other people are getting a good deal less, but the classification act would equalize that, and for myself I want to see the classification act passed. I am for it heartily.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. As soon as final action has been had upon the reclassification act, will it immediately go into effect?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but it would take a year to reclassify them after it is passed, so we are providing this bonus to meet the needs of the hour between the time of its passage and the time of its effectiveness by reclassification.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But if the reclassification act is passed and becomes a law during the fiscal year 1923 and this bill passes, this $180 will be a part of the basic salary in the reclassification.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is fixed for all time.

Mr. MADDEN. It is fixed for all time, and under this bill the pay would be given to everybody in the service until their particular positions were classified. Whether it lasted all the year would depend on when the classification took effect.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But it would be paid them as a part of the basic salary?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Possibly the gentleman has stated it, and I did not get it. Under this bill how many persons will get the bonus?

Mr. MADDEN. One hundred and seventy-six thousand, and there are over 650,000 people in the Government service. You want to remember that the bonus applies to only 176,000 of them, that it never has applied to the others, can not apply to them, and will not apply to them all. In this bill we have enumerated the number of people in every department who will be entitled to the bonus and the amount that will be carried for each department, and we have provided that under no circumstances can the head of a department expend in the payment of the bonus a sum in excess of the amount set out in the bill.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. Can the gentleman tell me how much money the Government pays yearly to its civil employees?

Mr. MADDEN. It is about $600,000,000. I think, altogether. I will put the correct figures in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. I was curious to know, and I know of no one better prepared to answer that question than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DENISON. In the original bonus legislation some language is used which would indicate that Congress did not intend the bonus to go to the employees on the Panama Canal.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true in this bill.

Mr. DENISON. They have been receiving it heretofore.

Mr. MADDEN. Then that is in violation of law.

Mr. DENISON. Is there anything in the bill on the subject of the Panama Canal?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; here is what it says:

The provisions of the act do not apply to the following employees: Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in the postal revenues, except employees of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia, who shall be included; employees whose pay is adjustable from time to time through wage boards or similar authority to accord with the commercial rates paid locally for the same class of service; employees of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone; employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in Alaska; employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus, divisions, commissions, or any other governmental agencies or employments created by law since January 1, 1916, except employees of the United States Tariff Commission, the United States Veterans' Bureau, the Bureau of the Budget, the General Accounting Office, and the Bureau of Accounts of the Post Office Department, who shall be included, but the additional compensation granted herein shall not be paid to any person employed in the United States Veterans' Bureau who did not receive the additional compensation during the fiscal year 1922; employees whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, who shall be included; employees whose services are utilized for brief periods at intervals; persons employed by or through corporations, firms, or individuals acting for or on behalf of or as agents of the United States or any department or independent establishment of the Government of the United States in connection with construction work or the operation of plants; employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside source under cooperative arrangements with the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia; employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation, and employees who may be provided with special allowances because of their service in foreign countries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Under the provisions of this act could the postal employees receive a bonus?

Mr. MADDEN. Their salaries have been classified, and that would be an equivalent. They have never been included.

Mr. DENISON. Notwithstanding that provision, the Panama Canal act provides that the employees in the Canal Zone shall receive 25 per cent more than is paid to similar employees.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true; but that is on account of the climatic conditions and not on account of a bonus.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Why is it that you have not passed the reclassification bill?

Mr. MADDEN. We have.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not take the position that his party has fulfilled its promise to pass all these meritorious bills that is said was absolutely essential when they are still pending in the Senate?

Mr. MADDEN. The distinguished gentleman from Texas knows that I am heartily in favor of the reclassification act, and there is nothing for which I could express more regret than the fact that it has not been passed by the Senate. The House has done its duty.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman believe that one way to force them to pass it is to say that we are not going to pass any bonus bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I said a few minutes ago that it would be better for the employees if we did not give them any bonus, because then they would organize to such an extent as to be able to force the passage of the law. But even if the reclassification act is to be passed there will have to be a bonus until the reclassification under that law takes place.

Mr. BOND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BOND. I understand there are 175,000 people who get the benefit of this act. Was this the amount they got under the pre-war basis compensation?

Mr. MADDEN. The base pay was not increased.

Mr. BOND. Was this pre-war pay as high as the employees outside of the service got?

Mr. MADDEN. The outside service all over the United States is reducing the compensation every day.

Mr. BOND. Not to less than the pre-war basis.

Mr. MADDEN. Far below the basis on which these people are paid. They are paid higher than those on the outside.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman from Illinois and I had a controversy a few moments ago regarding the statement made by him some weeks ago. I want to call attention to the debate which the gentleman had with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] on the legislative appropriation bill, and call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois did not deny that he had made such a statement. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] said:

The gentleman has stated through the press that in the event the reclassification bill does not pass he will ask for a resolution extending the bonus for another year.

So unless we do provide in the way which I have suggested for these parties and that reclassification bill does not pass they would absolutely have no relief whatever.

And the gentleman from Illinois said, "We can include them." I think that this statement was heralded in the press here in Washington and all through the country and carried the message that the gentleman from Illinois intended that the bonus should stand for another year without any change.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman can not twist what I said by any system of imagination to mean that I ever promised anybody anything.

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not have to twist it; it is printed here in plain English.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can not make me say that I agreed to anything. I said, "We can." And that means "you can"; that Congress can. What I did say was this; I think I can quote what I said. I did not say it on that day. I said it when I was presenting the Treasury bill. I said we do not include the bonus to civil employees of the Government in this or any other appropriation bill; that we would not include it in any of these bills, but when the time came, toward the end of the session, if it was thought wise by Congress to consider the question, we would be glad to take it up for consideration. That is what I say now; we are taking it up for consideration. We have kept our pledge; we have presented the question for consideration, and you have the power to decide it.

After a careful and painstaking consideration we concluded that $180 ought to be paid instead of $240, and that conclusion was reached after careful study and deliberation, taking into account the people of the United States that paid the taxes as well as the people of the United States who received the bonus.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman refers to the people who are going to be burdened by this taxation. I notice he refers to one class, the farmers, and pictures to us their distress in words magically eloquent. How long since has the gentleman been coddling agricultural interests when he speaks of economy?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I want to say to the gentleman that I have been an agriculturist all my life.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman belong to the agricultural bloc?

Mr. MADDEN. I belong to the great American group consisting of 110,000,000 people.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman did not refer to them, or express any regret regarding the burden of taxation they bear in common with the farmers.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; I said that there were 110,000,000 people, and that we are presumably here to speak for them. Did he not hear that?

Mr. CROWTHER. I heard that, but the gentleman specifically referred to the farmers.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I was describing a particular case.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, let us have harmony, harmony. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's heart is entirely too tender.

Mr. CROWTHER. Oh, I do not want to be technical——

Mr. MADDEN. I said tender, not technical.

Mr. CROWTHER. Would the gentleman be willing to set aside these $9,000,000 that he claims we would save as a little nest egg for the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. MADDEN. I am in favor of putting the $9,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States, and if it is possible to add something to that, to relieve the burden of taxation from the backs of the people. I am in favor of that.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to say to the gentleman that I am as anxious as he is that the burdens of taxation shall be lightened, but I think it is a mighty poor way to save money by cutting down wages.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not complaining about what the gentleman thinks or knows, but I have my views about what we ought to do, and the gentleman can differ from me if he wants to, and it will not hurt my feelings a bit.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, at the time I asked for 10 minutes I had overlooked the fact that the rule provided that the debate be confined to the bill. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman mind stating what he is going to talk about.

Mr. POU. Not at all. I am going to discuss the legislation that is before the House, what the Committee on Rules has done, and the Muscle Shoals matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, within the last few days the Committee on Rules has been rather generous in reporting out special rules. As many as nine have been voted out through the action of the Committee on Rules. Some of them are of very great importance, others are not quite so important. I find that one of the resolutions agreed to by the Rules Committee provides for the consideration of what is known as the Fish resolution, providing for an expression of opinion by the United States Government as to the advisability of establishing a home or refuge for the Jews in Palestine. The Rules Committee gave that matter very serious consideration and did not hesitate to authorize a favorable report.

Then, another rule is that pertaining to migratory birds. It is proposed, I believe, to require everybody who shoots migratory birds, such as quail, robbins, and woodpeckers, to take out a United States license and pay a fee. After this important piece of legislation becomes a law no man will dare to shoot migratory wild game without taking out a license and paying the Government a fee, or run the risk of prosecution and perhaps a jail sentence.

Then, another rule provides for the continuation of certain land offices. And still another rule provides for the passage of the Capper-Tincher grain law, which was very urgently pressed and which the Committee on Rules favorably reported this morning.

There is still another resolution which we reported out—and I speak seriously about this, because action should have been taken long ago. I refer to the bill which provides increased compensation to the totally disabled ex-service men; those who are totally blind; those who have lost both arms or both legs and who require the constant attention of a nurse. The Rules Committee did a very wise and necessary and commendable act in providing for the consideration of that particular measure. It ought to be passed unanimously.

Then we have given the Committee on Agriculture still another day. We dumped out, almost at one fell swoop, nine special rules. There is another matter of some importance that is pending, and inasmuch as everyone is talking about the three-day recesses and thinking of going home, a motion was made by a minority member of the Committee on Rules to provide for the consideration of the Muscle Shoals measure, which, I understand, has taken weeks of the time of the committee that had it in charge, a subject which has engaged the attention of the country almost as much as the subsidy bill. A motion was made to take this bill up and give the House an opportunity to vote upon it and forthwith a motion to adjourn was made, and the Committee on Rules upon motion voted to adjourn.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman ought to state to the House whether or not it was the minority to the majority that made the motion to adjourn, so that he can place the responsibility.

Mr. POU. I believe I am not permitted to go further than to state the result of the vote. I think it will not be denied that the minority was very earnestly in favor of the consideration of the Muscle Shoals measure.

Mr. GARNER. And the majority adjourned.

Mr. POU. And the majority adjourned on us, walked out of the room. So it seems they are not even going to consider this matter. Yet I sat in my seat and the time is not many months back when I heard the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations speak of Muscle Shoals as one of the great burdens of the Democratic administration, where the Democratic administration had sunk millions of dollars, all of which would be utter loss to the American people. It was stated that project was not worth a continental, and yet here is a man who offers to take it off the hands of the Government and the Committee on Rules adjourns and will not even give the House an opportunity to vote upon the Ford offer.

Gentlemen can draw their own conclusions. I am not here to discuss the Muscle Shoals matter, for I have not given it sufficient study, but I do know one of the most serious questions that concerns the agricultural masses of this country in this day and time is how to procure commercial fertilizer at fair, just, economical prices; and you will not always be able to sidestep this question, gentlemen. You may take your three-day recesses, you may go home, but just as sure as we are now in this Chamber the time will come in the not distant future when the Committee on Rules will not adjourn when the Muscle Shoals proposition is brought before that committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order in the time allotted to him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has referred to some of the troubles that are laid at the door of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman told you of our troubles. What he has told you I am sure has impressed the committee of the trend of the House of Representatives to go to the Committee on Rules whenever the House wants action upon any matter. I mention this because there will come a time in the very near future when it will be necessary for the House of Representatives to make some provision for the Committee on Rules to execute the will of the House with some degree of expedition. Now, as to the rules which have been agreed to I want to say this: I think the gentleman from North Carolina will not disagree with what I say. The Committee on Rules has not sought any of the business which has been transacted by it. We have not gone out after any of these bills. They have come to us. Their importance have been impressed upon the committee, and we have yielded to the demands of the House of Representatives in granting these rules. It is true——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Has the pressure been greater for these various nine rules on the committee than the Muscle Shoals matter?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; the only pressure brought to bear upon the Committee on Rules for a rule on Muscle Shoals was a motion made this morning in the committee by a member of the committee to report out a resolution that was pending in the committee.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us why the rule was not reported?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have only five minutes. [Laughter.] I will state this to the gentleman from Texas, that one of the purposes was to give the gentleman from Texas an opportunity to read the bill and the report.

Mr. GARNER. Well, does the gentleman mean to say that there was nobody on the Republican side sufficiently interested to ask a rule or press the committee for action?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean to say this, that the bill providing for the giving away of Muscle Shoals and guaranteeing for 100 years the expenses of its maintenance was only reported eight or nine days ago. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And I think the matter of giving away $107,000,000 worth of property and guaranteeing its maintenance for 100 years is a matter of sufficient importance to justify the Committee on Rules in asking the House of Representatives to acquaint itself with the provisions of the bill, and that the Members may read not only the bill but the report and minority views.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman in favor of the Muscle Shoals proposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have only had an opportunity to read the bill itself. I want now to read the majority report and the minority views, and I shall state when the roll is called whether I am in favor or against the bill.

Mr. GARNER. When is the gentleman going to let us have that roll call?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman from Kansas know of anything the Rules Committee could do or any rule it could pass that would recover back the approximately $75,000,000 wasted on Muscle Shoals by the last Democratic administration? [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from South Dakota has propounded a poser, and that I submit to my friend from Texas to answer—in his own time.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will give an opportunity, the House of Representatives, I believe, including the Republicans, will tell how to get it back. Are you going to give us a chance; will the gentleman give us a chance?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, the gentleman from Texas can not throw me into a spasm.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to have the gentleman tell us if he is going to give us a chance to have a roll call?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The matter is of great importance and will be considered in due time when reached, but it will not be considered in the interest of any one man when it is considered, but in the interest of the whole American people.

Mr. GARNER. When can we have that opportunity on behalf of the American people?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There will be a time for the consideration of all these important matters. Now, I want to say the Committee on Rules has reported out for the consideration of the House some rules here this morning which were spoken of lightly by the gentleman from North Carolina. The matter pertaining to what is known as the Capper-Tincher bill is a matter of very great importance to the people of this country. The matter has been before the country in one way or another for a great many years. The legislation has heretofore failed. In a recent decision the Supreme Court decided that the taxing clause of the Constitution could not be resorted to for regulatory purposes. It indicated in its opinion the way by which the end sought might be reached.

The Committee on Agriculture, after long and arduous labor, met the conditions imposed by the Supreme Court and incorporated them in the bill, and the bill has been reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and a rule, of course, after considerable difficulty, has been finally agreed to by the Committee on Rules, and will be presented if the chairman of the Committee on Rules may have the indulgence of the House to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

The other matters that were presented are of such importance that the legislative committees agreed to them, and the Committee on Rules should not be criticized for enabling the legislative committees of the House to function as they have desired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Speaking of the rules asked for by the Committee on Agriculture, does the gentleman remember when the Rules Committee gave the Committee on Agriculture three days for considering bills and the sugar bill was brought up and defeated?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is behind us.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It was considered and defeated, and I was wondering after the election if they were to give them another opportunity to get loot out of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I protest most vigorously against the short-sighted, close-fisted, unjust, and tricky proposal rushed in here to cut the salaries of Government employees after they had been led along to believe that they would get at least $240 in adjusted compensation, if not substantial permanent increases in their salaries.

In endeavoring to crowd this measure through at the eleventh hour, with the implied threat that we must vote for it or the army of faithful clerks will get nothing in the way of a miscalled "bonus," the Republican majority is but shoveling a few more spadefuls from their political grave.

The present—and passing—Republican administration won their elevation by promising the people efficient economy, a reorganization of the Federal workshop, and a reclassification on a scientific, businesslike basis of the thousands of earnest workers in the Government service. They have done none of this.

Failing under a scientific Budget system to make anything more than a paper showing of saving on expenditures, they now flaunt before us that they can save $9,000,000 by taking $5 a month out of the pay envelopes of Uncle Sam's employees, every one of whom receives less than $2,500 and most of them from $900 to $1,200.

In the name of all that is reasonable, how can anyone, married or single, support a family on that much. And, mark you, we call this a "bonus," but it is not. This is adjusted compensation, to every cent of which, and more, the workers are entitled. This was given to them in lieu of increases in salaries at a time when the high cost of living was driving them crazy and to cajole them into staying in the Government service during the easy-money days when they could have received much more in outside employment. Remember, too, that these are the "truck horses" of the Government service who keep the wheels of government moving steadily. They know their jobs and do the work. But you called in during the war days immature boys and girls and inexperienced men and women and gave them from lump-sum appropriations far more than these experienced, reliable, and dependable employees were receiving. The people of the country will frown upon an administration and a party that strives to make a false showing of "economy" by taking $5 a month out of their meager salaries.

You Republicans have failed also to put through your efficiency-economy program of reorganization, because several members of the Harding Cabinet have been at swords points among themselves, each jealous and fearful that he will lose some small fraction of his temporary and transient jurisdiction. This Cabinet fight has developed into what would be a national scandal, and you try to cloak it over by taking $5 a month from the pockets of the Government employees of small salaries.

Again, you Republicans have failed to put through the promised reclassification. Why? Because with two measures before you carrying different schedules of increases you have allowed pride of authorship in these particular bills to get them into a deadlock. Yes; and the situation has grown so tense that your party leaders have gone to the President urging him to call a conference of the quarreling Republican fathers of these bills and to get them to compromise in the interests of party success. Here you had carefully considered schedules to establish new statutory salaries for the Government workers, both of which proposals meant substantial increases above their present salaries plus the bonus. Personal and party politics have prevented the passage of either measure.

With the avowed purpose of the reclassification bills to put all Government employees doing the same or equivalent work on an equal-pay basis this Congress, Republican in both branches, has created still further discrimination which will be intensified by the passage of the measure now under consideration. You have put certain classes of Government workers on an increased pay schedule, giving them new, permanent, statutory salaries—for example, the postal employees and the employees of the Patent Office. That action was perfectly proper and justified. But your proposition now to create still further discrimination by cutting the salaries of all other low-salaried workers is unjustified, unjust, and nonsensical.

You have the official reports of the United States Bureau of Efficiency that the present schedule of salaries is disgraceful. You have the testimony of department heads and leaders in Congress that there must be substantial increases. You have had laid before you comparative statistics showing that Uncle Sam has more efficient but woefully underpaid help than in any private industry. You have the official reports of the Department of Labor giving statistics which show an increase in the cost of living for the District of Columbia.

I wish to call to your attention the fact that wholesale prices from January, 1922, to May, 1922, are on the upward trend and are still going up. Prices of farm products increased 8.2 per cent, food 5.3 per cent, fuel and lighting 10.8 per cent, and the general index of wholesale prices, including 400 commodities, shows an increase of 7.2 per cent from January, 1922, to May, 1922. Cloths and clothing as measured by the wholesale prices increased 2.3 per cent. If wholesale prices are to continue to go up, as indicated by these figures, retail prices along all lines will stop going down; in fact, they have stopped. The retail prices of 43 articles of food in the District of Columbia have increased 2.1 per cent in the last two months, and this is an average increase, which, of course, means that a number of single articles of necessary consumption have increased very materially in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. May I have one minute more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. With this testimony before you, with scientific schedules prepared by experts before you, you play politics and then your tight-fisted and shortsighted Appropriations Committee brings in a verdict that we must tax all Government workers $5 a month if we expect to win reelection. Yes, gentlemen; that is, in effect, what the report on the misnamed "bonus" bill says.

And while you have continued to play the game of "wiggle and wobble," leading the workers to rest confident that they would get at least their present salaries continued, then smugly coming out and saying, "We did not assure them the $240 bonus; we only promised them a bonus," you have been forgetting that there is a moral obligation on Uncle Sam as an employer not to short change his workers in this way. You seem to have forgotten that if there is one trait strong in the American people—in the voters, if it pleases you, since your whole concern seems to be how they will look upon what you do—that is "fair play." I tell you that you are not playing fair with these workers, and the American people will not be satisfied with such action.

It is not the fault of the Government employees that there has been delay in passing the reclassification bill. They have been very patient in waiting. For years they have suffered the throes of periodic uncertainty regarding how much salary they are to get. If a Budget system was necessary for the Federal Government, it is just as necessary for each employee to know how much salary he is going to get and that he can be sure of. These thousands of Government employees, doing what is most essential for the future of the Government, bringing up their families according to American standards, educating them in American ideals, have been led to expect at least as much salary next year as they have been getting this year. Now you come and say, "We must cut you down $5 a month." It is easy to say, "Thus we save the country $12,000,000." But that $5 a month means more than most of you realize to these people, all of whom are in stringent if not destitute circumstances.

Nowhere has there been any evidence to show that the Government employees are getting excessive salaries and that they should be reduced, yet here you come with a blanket proposition—we are going to cut all the low-salaried employees $5 a month.

You had better think it over very carefully, gentlemen, from an economic standpoint, from a question of humanity, and—since it seems to move you most—from a political viewpoint also. "Beware of November, 1922." [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when the cost of living and the compensation of employees generally in the country were greatly increased on account of the war, Congress first provided a bonus of $120 a year to the civil employees of the Government; and subsequently, when the cost of living was still increasing and the compensation of employees generally had been further increased, the bonus was increased to $240 a year. In the opinion of the committee some recession can be made in that amount now. But here is the situation: The reclassification bill as it passed the House provided for a reclassification of the civil employees of the Government based on the salaries which they were receiving at the time the reclassification takes effect which, if it should become a law at once, would not be until July, 1923. The reclassification would not take effect until July, 1923. The initial salaries which the employees of the Government are to receive under that reclassification will be largely based on the salaries they are receiving at that time, including any bonus as a part of the salary. So that if no bonus is granted for this next fiscal year that amount will not be taken into consideration, but the initial salaries under the reclassification act will be the basic salary without a bonus. But if we provide for a bonus for the next fiscal year, then the amount of that bonus will be included in the permanent salaries under the reclassification act.

Mr. LAYTON. Regardless of the cost of living.

Mr. MANN. It would not make any difference about the cost of living. Now, while I am not in favor of paying large salaries to Government employees, I submit that there has been a permanent increase in the cost of living which will be permanent during our day and generation to at least the amount of the bonus proposed here. And if we passed a reclassification act designed to bring some spirit of cooperation and sympathy from the employees of the Government, it would not be wise to base the salaries fixed by the reclassification act merely upon the old salaries which the employees have been receiving for many years. Hence we ought to provide for some bonus for the next fiscal year. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I find that people in my district and my State are crying for economy, but I have never yet found any of them crying for that kind of economy which requires the reduction of the salaries of the poorest-paid employees of the Government. I find that salaries throughout my section are all from 50 to 100 per cent more than they were before the war, and certainly to take off or reduce this additional compensation at this time is highly improper, in my judgment, when everything is so very high, such as rent, foodstuffs, and clothing; in fact, everything we must purchase.

I noticed in the paper yesterday where the chairman of the Shipping Board made appointments of two or three men at salaries of $25,000 a year. You have been creating a number of offices during the past year aggregating $7,500 to $10,000 a year, and there are hundreds of such. It seems to me if we want to reduce the expenses of the Government by reducing salaries we ought to adopt the same principle we adopted in reference to the income tax. In the income tax we said that the men who received the largest salaries and the largest incomes should bear the greater proportion of the Government expenses. We should carry that policy or principle into the wage question, and if we must reduce the expenses of the Government by reducing salaries we should begin with the men receiving the high salaries and not start in with the men who receive small ones.

There are 176,000 employees affected by this bill out of the total of 600,000 employees, and by reducing the additional compensation from $240 to $180 would be saving $9,000,000. There has been a great deal of talk about the reclassification bill, but according to my recollection when that bill was under discussion it was plainly stated that the reclassification act would be a greater expense upon the Government than the $28,000,000 called for under present legislation. It certainly is not right, it is not fair, to carry out what the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee said, and use the Government employees to build a fire under the Senate to compel it to pass the reclassification bill.

If the Senate does not choose to do it, it is up to the Senate, but it is not fair nor proper for this branch of the Government, the representatives of 110,000,000 people, to take it out upon Government employees merely because of the Senate's neglect of Government employees and make them bear the loss and expense in salary.

I do not believe we pay tremendous salaries, except in few instances. In the Bureau of Printing and Engraving—of which I said something the other day, several capable men were ousted by this administration—I noticed in the speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] that the Chief of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, Mr. Rose, one of those removed and who was receiving a salary of $5,000, had been offered in the last two days by an English engraving concern $20,000 a year salary. In other words, we were receiving the services of a man for $5,000 for which an English concern is willing and ready to pay $20,000. Mr. Smiley, the head of the Vignette Engraving Division, who received a salary of $7,500, was offered a position by the American Bank Note Co. paying $10,000 a year. I think you will find all down through the line that there are hundreds of Government employees who can get better salaries outside than the Government is paying them to-day.

You will ask, Why do they not accept those positions? The man who comes to Washington as an employee purchases a home, gets his children established in school and is tied to the job in the Government, and whether you reduce his salary or increase his salary, he can not leave because every tie binds him to those things most dear to him. He is bound to Washington, and it is for the House of Representatives and the Senate to see that he is fairly and justly treated. So I take the position that, considering the increase in the price of everything, I shall support the compensation of $240 a year, as is now the law and should be the law for the next year. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the constant abuse of the word "bonus" in relation to the salaries of Government employees is shocking. The $240 allowance is not a bonus. A bonus is either an extra reward for extra effort or it is a gratuity. The increase of $240 was given because Congress was either too lazy or too incompetent to give an increase which should be proportionate to the rise in the cost of living. Instead of studying the thing and raising the compensation, so that it should conform to the increased cost of living, Congress discovered the word "bonus." The bonus was fixed at $240. It was not $239; it was not $211 or $199.67, but $240. So far as the amount was concerned, it was purely an accident. It was surely not the result of study or investigation, and it had no relation whatever to the actual needs of the Government employee.

Is the reduction in the cost of living between the year 1920 and now such as would justify us in reducing the present compensation of the Government employees? Any man who knows anything about the cost of living knows that we can not get our shoes or clothing or a home to live in or anything we want without paying at least 50 per cent more than we were paying several years ago. We are not paying enough to the Government employees as it is. I am not one of those who would like to show my friendship for labor at the expense of Uncle Sam. Many an inveterate enemy of organized labor and many a man who in his private capacity seeks to bind the hands of labor by injunctions and similar methods becomes very liberal at the expense of Uncle Sam.

Then there is another thing. Why do you assume that the condition of employees must not improve? Why do you take it for granted that they can not improve upon the condition that existed in 1914 or 1915? Why do you lay so much stress and emphasis on the cost of living? The standard of living of civilized man necessarily involves the element of growth and expansion. Civilized man wants more to-day than he wanted 10 or 15 years ago. The demands of life are greater, the call of life is stronger. You can not so mold and shape civilized man as to make his standards unchangeable. Why proceed upon the theory that the condition of the employees who happen to work for the Government can never improve; that his life must never be enlarged; that his standards must never be raised? It is poor economy, indeed, to attempt to save nine or ten million dollars by deducting $5 a month from the earnings of the men who get $800 or $900 a year from the Government of the United States, and they constitute the majority of the beneficiaries of the so-called "bonus."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have paid close attention to the debate, and, although I have not had the time to make an accurate study of how all this would work out, I am sure that it will make confusion and trouble at one place. I happen to be a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, and only yesterday that joint committee met for the purpose, among other things, of considering an appeal which has been put out broadcast by the Civil Service Commission in an effort to keep up the supply of printers needed at the Government Printing Office. The work is heavy there. The printing business is heavy throughout the United States. There is a shortage of expert printers. A partial reason for the shortage of printers at the Government Printing Office is that the printers under the scale fixed by Congress, with the bonus added, at the Government Printing Office, working eight hours a day, is less than the scale for commercial printers here in the city of Washington. The wage scale in the newspaper offices down town for 42 hours a week is $43.68 and in the Government Printing Office it is $40.60 for a 48-hour week.

Mr. MADDEN. What about the 30 days' leave?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the book and job offices it is $42 per week. These are commercial propositions. Of course, we must take into consideration the vacation and the sick leave, but I do not think that people on an hourly basis should have them. However, we do not cure that defect with this legislation. We simply make the situation worse. My experience is that people paid in that way, and many others, for that matter, by the very nature of things live from hand to mouth, practically speaking. When the time comes to get a job, the printer who needs the money will take the seven-hour job at $44 rather than the Government eight-hour job at $42 with a vacation thrown in at some time in the rosy future.

If the bonus is reduced to the figures proposed in this bill, the Government scale will be $38.40, as against $43.68 down town. There are over 4,000 employees in the Government Printing Office, a great institution. We were told yesterday in our effort to supply the need for labor there through the civil service that this scale, not counting the leave, is less than the commercial scale in other surrounding cities, in Philadelphia and in New York.

Mr. MADDEN. How much less work do those men do than men in a commercial house in a day?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They work one hour more.

Mr. MADDEN. How much less work do they do?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A good printer, in my opinion, will do the work he should do in an hour. We are assumed to have good printers.

Mr. MADDEN. The testimony before one of our subcommittees was to the effect that for the same class of business, the same amount of business, the same volume of business, as they do in the Government Printing Office they could do it with 2,600 employees less.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That may be so as to every form of Government work.

Mr. MADDEN. And the Government Printer admitted that that was true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suspect it, but we run that Printing Office and we have to have the printing. We do the best we can; there are many good men there; we get the best men we can. We are unable to bring in new, snappy printers for every single place; for that reason we have quite a number of employees below the fair standard of efficiency; but the Government does not have a way of throwing out broken-down printers.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state whether there has been any reduction in the number of employees at the Government Printing Office since we reduced the number of these magazines and pamphlets?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is going on continually. During the year just past there was a reduction from 4,765 men to 4,255, and the reduction still goes on. In spite of doing away with voluntary printing—that is, unnecessary Federal publications—the Federal establishment is rapidly growing larger and the demand for printing is larger. Consider, for instance, the printing of these income-tax blanks, which are sent to all the people of the United States; it amounts, probably, to as much as the cost of the whole business of the Government Printing Office 20 years ago. Do you know what it means to print these millions of blanks which go over all the country to every man who has an income?

My opinion, after listening to this debate so far, is this, that we are likely to destroy the system not only here but elsewhere in chopping off the $240 bonus before we get anything else quite ready, and rather than see this bill beaten with the words "one hundred and eighty dollars" in it I think it would be better to amend this bill and make it a legal $240 bonus. I yield back whatever time remains.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes ot the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this matter comes before the committee on a proposition affecting the compensation for the fiscal year 1923 of 176,000 of the poorest-paid Federal employees. I think it is unfortunate that it has been referred to as a "bonus" and the impression given that it is a mere gratuity or favor that Congress grants out of a spirit of good will and not out of a spirit of a legitimate businesslike effort to meet extraordinary conditions that grew out of the increased cost of living during the war. I think a majority of the Members when they voted for the $240 bonus, or rather when we first started the bonus which was less than that, had in mind the idea that possibly the increased cost of living we were seeking to meet was a temporary proposition that would pass away with the end of the war. Now, the House is confronted with this situation: Has the increased cost of living receded; and if so, to what extent? The committee contends that it has receded to such an extent that you could reduce this additional compensation down to $180. That is the whole proposition. There was some reduction some time during the last year in the cost of living, but my information, and all the information that I could get, is that there had been a slight steady increase in the cost of living in the last few months, which will probably continue; and I think if you will get the figures on the cost of living you will find that in the lower grades of furniture and cotton goods and underwear and those things bought by the lowest-paid employees who are affected by this, I fear you will find that instead of there being a recession the price to-day has increased. I have occasion to know in a business way that the cost of the character of things referred to being put out by the mills for next season's delivery have advanced and that the trade journals point to it as evidence of the return of prosperity to the country.

Now, gentlemen, we know that rents instead of decreasing are advancing. Rents in the District of Columbia, by concerted action in the last 90 days, have been increased from $5 to $25 per month an apartment. And the same is true in Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Little Rock, Fort Smith, and all the other important cities where these people are largely employed. My information is that there is a steady increase in rents. Now, gentlemen, that presents to my mind this practical proposition: Has there been a recession? Will there be any for 1923? If what the industrial papers and the financial journals point to with pride as a sign of return of prosperity, a stiffening of commodity prices, if that be true, if 1923 justifies that expectation, I can not escape the conclusion that these employees are going to have to pay as much, and in some instances more, for living in 1923 than in 1922 or 1921. Now, that is my candid judgment, gentlemen.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I have but five minutes. That is my candid judgment. Now, if that be true, then it occurs to me that there is no basis for a reduction in the compensation, if the prospect held out for the next fiscal year is that these lower-paid employees who buy this class of commodities find their costs will probably increase instead of decreasing. Then, I think that will seriously challenge any man's attention as to whether we should go ahead and reduce the pay of these employees. If you will frame a bill, if you can devise some scheme by which the legislative branch can compel a reduction in the number of employees now in the Government service, I am with you there. I think there is where the greatest economy can be exercised. Another method would be to reduce some of the salaries of officials drawing $10,000 up to and including those drawing $35,000, which latter positions this administration has largely increased over my protest. Another matter that prevents reducing salaries of the poorest paid Government employees as you propose is the pending Republican profiteers' tariff bill, which all honest, intelligent men admit will increase the cost of living at least $60 a year for each family.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to use more time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MADDEN. Let the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia who receive a total of compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum or less, except as otherwise provided in this act, shall receive during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, additional compensation at the rate of $180 per annum: Provided, That such employees as receive a total of annual compensation at a rate more than $2,500 and less than $2,680 shall receive additional compensation at such rate per annum as may be necessary to make their salaries, plus their additional compensation, at the rate of $2,680 per annum, and no employee shall receive additional compensation under this act at a rate which is more than 45 per cent of the rate of the total annual compensation received by such employee: Provided further, That the increased compensation at the rate of $240 per annum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, shall not be computed as salary in construing this act: Provided further, That where an employee in the service on June 30, 1921, has received during the fiscal year 1922, or shall receive during the fiscal year 1923, an increase of salary at a rate in excess of $200 per annum, or where an employee, whether previously in the service or not, has entered the service since June 30, 1921, whether such employee has received an increase in salary or not, such employees shall be granted the increased compensation provided herein only when and upon the certification of the person in the legislative branch or the head of the department or establishment employing such persons of the ability and qualifications personal to such employees as would justify such increased compensation.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 1, line 8, strike out the figure "180" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "240."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey will not prevail. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] You are not going to drive me off the floor. I have always been courteous to you, and I think I am entitled to respectful consideration, and I do not see why I do not get it. I do not believe the amendment ought to be adopted. Certainly it ought not to be adopted. We have the official statement of the Secretary of Labor to the effect that the cost of living has gone down 25 per cent since 1920. We have already knowledge of the fact that the so-called bonus was only given as a Government contribution to the increased cost of living. Now, if that is true, there is not any reason in the world why we should not take off part of this contribution when the cost of living has gone down. That it has gone down there is absolutely no doubt. What it may do in the future, of course, no one can say. I believe that in the consideration of the problem before us we ought to have in mind not only the employee and the justice we want to do to him but the man who pays the employee as well.

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, now that the $240 has been adopted there are several other amendments that ought to be made.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will offer the amendments, if the gentleman does not mind.

On page 1, line 10, strike out "$2,680" and substitute "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment. Does the gentleman wish to offer his amendments separately?

Mr. WALSH. That is the only way he can offer them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 1, line 10, strike out "$2,680" and insert "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 2, line 2, striking out "$2,680" and inserting "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, line 2, strike out "$2,680" and insert "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. And on line 4, page 2, strike out the figures "45" and insert the figures "60."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "45" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "60."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved May 10, 1916, as amended by the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, shall not operate to prevent anyone from receiving the additional compensation provided in this act who otherwise is entitled to receive the same.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the distinguished chairman of the committee whether all the sections of the bill except section 1 are a copy of the existing law?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; except the figures. We will have to change those to conform with the amendments as we go along.

Mr. LONDON. But the substance is identical?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. We will have to change the figures as we come to them later on, in order to increase the amount.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave at this point to offer a substitute to the legislative, executive, and judicial section on page 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That to pay the additional compensation provided in this act to employees of the Government of the United States, there are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, respectively:

LEGISLATIVE.

United States Senate, $138,330; House of Representatives, $236,250; Library of Congress, $79,200; Library Building and grounds, $22,527; Architect of the Capitol, $64,455; Botanic Garden, $9,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave at this point to offer a substitute to the legislative, executive, and judicial portion, following the section on page 5, to make the figures to conform to the adoption of $240.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to offer a substitute.

Mr. MADDEN. To conform to the amendment previously adopted, of $240. The only difference is to change the figures to agree with what has been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of section 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 6. That to pay the additional compensation provided in this act to employees of the Government of the United States there are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, respectively:

"LEGISLATIVE.

"United States Senate, $184,440; House of Representatives, $315,000; Library of Congress, $105,600; Library Building and grounds, $30,036; Architect of the Capitol, $85,940; Botanic Garden, $12,000.

"EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL.

"Independent offices: Bureau of Efficiency, $7,200; Civil Service Commission, $87,936; Commission of Fine Arts, $480; Executive Office, $10,560; Federal Trade Commission, $50,600; General Accounting Office, $506,400; Government Printing Office, $957,260; Interstate Commerce Commission, $315,812; National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, $15,600; Panama Canal, $16,800; Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, $720; Smithsonian Institution, $109,044; State, War, and Navy Department Buildings, $372,000; Tariff Commission, $20,000; United States Employees' Compensation Commission, $15,800; United States Veterans' Bureau, $4,013,480.

"Executive departments: Department of Agriculture, $3,232,863; Department of Commerce, $1,835,159; Department of the Interior, $2,803,692; Department of Justice and the judiciary, $779,484; Department of Labor, $566,832; Navy Department, $444,720; Naval Establishment, $42,000; Post Office Department, $359,280; Department of State, $144,000; Treasury Department, $10,724,326; War Department, including the Military Establishment and all other field activities, $8,122,548.

"In all, $36,287,012: Provided, That the additional compensation granted in this act shall be applied by administrative officers in such a manner that the appropriations made herein will not be exceeded."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That to pay the additional compensation provided in this act to employees of the government of the District of Columbia, the following sums are hereby appropriated: One million forty-nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-one dollars, of which 40 per cent is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; $18,720 from the revenues of the water department on account of employees of that department; $39,000 from the revenues of the water department on account of employees of the Washington Aqueduct; $13,140 wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia on account of employees of the Minimum Wage Board, the play grounds department, and the community center department of the public schools.

In all, $1,120,621.

Sixty per cent of any amounts expended under the provisions of this act on account of employees of the United States whose basic compensation is payable 60 per cent from the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent from the Treasury of the United States shall be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 18, strike out "$1,049,761" and insert "$1,399,681."
On page 6, line 21, strike out "$18,720" and insert "$24,960."
On page 6, line 23, strike out "$39,000" and insert "$52,000."
On page 6, line 24, strike out "$13,140" and insert "$17,520."
On page 7, line 4, strike out "$1,120,621" and insert "$1,494,161."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my colleague what is the necessity of the last provision of section 7 as to reimbursement? The appropriation is made 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. One has to do with the District employees and the other with Government employees.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. MADDEN. This has to do with District employees.

Mr. MANN. It appropriates 40 per cent out of the Treasury and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. What is the necessity, then, of providing that the Treasury shall be reimbursed with 60 per cent of the revenues of the District of Columbia? The appropriation is made out of the revenues of the District of Columbia for the 60 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Some of the local courts and the Department of Justice are paid for partly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and partly out of the Federal Treasury. Some of the employees are in these institutions, and it is necessary on that account to have that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCARTHUR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Lehlbach amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us also have a separate vote on the Madden amendment, which is in conformity with the change in the bill made by the Lehlbach amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point that there is no quorum present. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] desire a separate vote on one amendment?

Mr. VOIGT. On the Lehlbach amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is, to increase it. The appropriations go with it. It is all one proposition. The other amendments follow the Lehlbach amendment either way.

Mr. VOIGT. I withdraw my request and consent to have them all voted on together.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a separate vote was demanded on the Lehlbach amendment.

The SPEAKER. It was withdrawn.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Lehlbach amendment.

Mr. WINGO. If that is done, it will be necessary to have a separate vote on the other amendment, especially in section 1, because they are all affected by the same amendment. If that should be voted down, the House would be in an embarrassing attitude.

Mr. WALSH. Regular order, Mr. Speaker!

Mr. WINGO. I am in perfect order, as the gentleman would know if he had been listening.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WINGO. Very well. I will ask for a separate vote on each and every amendment, so as to please the meticulous gentleman from Cape Cod. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. A separate vote is demanded on each amendment. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: On page 1, line 8, strike out the figures "$180" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$240."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT and Mr. GARNER demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 19.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground of there not being a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those favoring the amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays 38, answered "present" 3, not voting 169, as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON answered "present," as above recorded.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee answered "present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the amendment having been adopted, I withdraw my demand for a separate vote on the other amendments and ask that the remaining amendments be voted on in gross.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The remaining amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN presented a conference report on the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District, for printing under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

PRINTING HOUSE DOCUMENT NO. 408.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, from the Joint Committee on Printing, presented the following privileged report, which was referred to the House Calendar:

House Concurrent Resolution 61.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 50,000 additional copies of parts 1 and 2 of House Document No. 408, being the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, in four parts, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 30,000 for the House, 1,000 for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, and 7,000 for the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry; and that there be printed 100,000 copies of parts 3 and 4 of House Document No. 408, being the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, of which 20,000 shall be for the Senate, 60,000 for the House, 2,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 4,000 for the House document room, and 14,000 for the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TYSON].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman expects to print the extension in the back of the RECORD.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do.

Mr. CRAMTON. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I print a speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. JOHN R. TYSON, of Alabama, on June 11, 1922, to the Baraca Class of the First Baptist Church of Montgomery, Ala., as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, I shall speak to you this morning on obedience to law.

In these days of reconstruction, in which the people of the civilized nations of the world are engaged in rehabilitating financial and political conditions, I know of no work which you can do more productive of "blessing," of mutual helpfulness in uplifting the citizenship of the Nation, and in working out the problems of life than the lending of the influence of your great fraternal ogranization, as a band of brothers, in creating conditions promotive of respect for law.

There can be no observance of and obedience to law unless there is a recognition of its supremacy and a reverence for it.

"All beings have their laws; the Deity has His laws, the material world has its laws, superior intelligences have their laws, the beasts of the field their laws, and man has his laws."

They emanate from God and radiate from the sun to the circling edge of creation. Indeed, the mighty Lawgiver has subjected himself unto the law. The virtue of nature is obedience to law.

In the operations of the natural world—the earth in its revolutions and the planets in the performance of their orbital functions—we find perfect obedience to the laws which their Maker prescribed for their regulation and government.

The least disobedience by them would result in the crash of worlds and the destruction of all vegetable, animal, and human life.

Burke has said: "There is but one law for all, viz, that law which governs all laws—the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity; the law of nature and of nations."

And this law finds responsive obedience in every sphere of its operation except by man. He is the most intelligent of all God's creatures and is the most disobedient to all laws. He establishes governments of laws and violates them. He does not appreciate that "true obedience is true liberty"; that the virtue of Christianity is obedience and that the virtue of good citizenship is loyalty to the laws of his creation; that his "laws are the very bulwarks of his liberty; that they define every man's rights and stand between and defend the individual liberties of all men."

He does not appreciate that without respect and love for the institutions and traditions, which are the outgrowth of the purposes established, nourished, and sustained by the principles of a more perfect union ordained to establish justice, to promote the general welfare, and to secure to ourselves and to our posterity the blessings of liberty, this Republic, the pride of the civilized world, will of necessity be a failure.

No democratic people can be prosperous, contented, and happy who are unwilling to protect their morals, health, and safety by the enforcement of laws made by their accredited representatives, and no democratic people can conserve their liberty who willingly trample under foot the fundamental principles established by their constitution. To depart from those principles and to refuse to give to them obedience, and to refuse to revere them as the supreme law of the land, as the embodiment of the bedrock of the life and liberties of the people of the Nation, will be to destroy the Government and to bring to a once liberty-loving people despotism and anarchy.

Let us understand and appreciate that in forming the Union, sanctified by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, our fathers recognized and sought to establish and promote man's relation to God, to himself, and to his fellow man, to ordain and establish that liberty, secured by governmental power, under which each citizen shall be forced to so conduct himself and so use his own property as not necessarily to injure another.

That in the creation of the indestructible Union of the States a democracy was established in this country recognizing that man was endowed by his creator with inalienable rights, such as life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and that those rights can only be conserved by obedience and respect for law.

Let us understand and appreciate that those who stand for the violation of the laws of our country are enemies to our Constitution, our civilization, and our Christian institutions, for the establishment of which our forefathers shed their blood and gave up their lives, and that defiant lawbreakers are not good citizens; that they are enemies to the public peace and morality of the people; that they promote disrespect for the courts, degrade American ideals, and, if suffered to continue in their defiance of law, will ultimately destroy the patriotic spirit which has made America the greatest of all civilized nations.

Let us understand that they are preying upon the vitals of the Nation, undermining its social and governmental status, destroying the blessings of liberty and all else that is sacredly enshrined in the hearts of all loyal Americans.

Let us all understand and carry the message to the people of the Nation that "where law ends tyranny begins."

Let us understand and proclaim to the people that respect and reverence for law is the basis of our civilization, of our liberties, and our religion.

The partnership between law and order can not be dissolved.

Law stands for the corporate and individual privileges and restraints that make for the order of the whole. If the combination is to succeed the desire for order must inspire the enactment of law; for order, i. e., harmony, throughout the body politic, is the one justification of law. Law is never an end in itself. It is the handmaid of order. Let us not forget that our social salvation is dependent upon the sustained efforts of the individual to develop himself for the sake of and with reference to the community. Let your organization make every effort to impress the individual citizen with the responsibility of citizenship to the end that he may appreciate his obligations to the members of the community in which he lives.

May I be pardoned for saying to you on this occasion that you can not render a greater service to your God and to your country than by assisting in promoting conditions that will arouse a healthy public sentiment against the evil effects of disobedience to law which will ultimately put an end to its violation.

Violators of law can not withstand the militant spirit of love, when aroused, which the American people have for their God, their laws, and their country. In the language of Abraham Lincoln, "Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property, and his sacred honor. Let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his fathers, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the law be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in the legislative halls, and enforced in the courts of justice. In short, let it become the political religion of the Nation."

Let the citizens of this Nation understand and appreciate that our Government is a "government of laws and not of men," and that "liberty exists in proportion to wholesome restraint," that each of them must submit to the limitations of the law for the sake of the stability of society and the security of their lives, their property, and their happiness.

Let us all revere the majesty of the law to which no greater tribute can be found than in the lines of that great and good man, Richard Hooker, "Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all, with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy."

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the President's letter which was read this morning be printed in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the President's letter read this morning be printed in 8-point type. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JONES of Texas (at the request of Mr. LANHAM), for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. FENN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, in 8-point type, an address delivered by the gentleman from New York, Mr. KISSEL, at the Victory Monument, at Brooklyn, on May 28.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, in 8-point type, a speech by his colleague, Mr. KISSEL. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman expects to put this in the back part of the RECORD?

Mr. HOGAN. I do.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an address delivered by Hon. JOHN KISSEL at the unveiling of the Victory and Peace Monument at Freedom Square, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Sunday, May 28, 1922. The address is as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, when I went to Washington I resolved to stay at Washington, to be present in attendance at every roll call of the House of Representatives and to be in position, as your servant in Washington, to answer every call or demand that might be made upon me wherever the effort and influence of a Member of Congress might be of aid to you as my constituents, individually or collectively. I have been asked to attend banquets here, social and political reunions, and have declined. But the invitation to attend here to-day came as a call to duty, to honor, in common with all my neighbors of every shade of religious and political thought, the memory of those brave men whose noble deeds will be an inspiration to posterity so long as this Republic lives and radiates its influence around the world.

"This is a memorial of peace. This is a memorial of victory. But we glory more in the peace than in the victory. The happiness of our times and of the days to come flows not from victory itself, but from the peace that follows victory. We are assembled here to commemorate the achievements of our honored dead, the boys who are still living in our hearts and still remembered with affection in the homes around us to which they once brought light and joy. They died that other homes might be brightened although the darkness might steal into their own. They died to maintain the high ideals of the American Nation, enriched by the ambitions of the men and women of all races that go to make up the American Nation; and their names will live in history and be familiar to succeeding generations long after our names have passed beyond the memory of living man.

"It is one of the regretful things of life that there is no joy that has not its attendant sorrow. When we see here to-day around us those gold-star mothers, the women who really feel the real evils of war, we ourselves begin to appreciate what victory has cost and that the value of peace is priceless. Our hearts are moved to sympathy that can find no adequate expression to relieve their suffering. We can only offer them the consolation that the Eternal Father Himself has promised—that for every gold star shining here there is a gold crown on the other shore reflecting in the glorious light of God's own love that sympathy which passeth all understanding, that sympathy which alone can reach the hearts of these mothers and awaken the spirit of resignation which carries with it its own reward here and in the hereafter.

"No matter whether our thoughts of life are found in the Old Testament or in the New, or in what church or temple, or at what altar or shrine we may worship, we have the common knowledge that heavenly bounties await the men who have made the sacrifices that have bettered humanity. They have made the supreme sacrifice that the victory won by their death might bring peace into our lives; and we, who are present to-day, ought here and now to resolve that as we honor them so shall we honor ourselves by consecrating ourselves to the sacred duty of providing for the dependents of these men and at least to see that these mothers are not neglected by the Nation for which their brave sons died. Some of them left wives, some of them left children. They should not be stinted to the miserable pittance of a charity, but cared for in manner worthy of the name and fame of the honored dead, and all the honor we give them here to-day is idle if the dependents near and dear to them are at any time left to destitution or despair.

"There is one other duty that rests upon us that is suggested by what these men fought and died for. We have given thought, time, effort, and money—money in the billions—to establish the liberties of the people of other lands. We have so intensely been engaged in the interests of others that for the time we lost sight of our own. We must from now on give first consideration to our own people. These men died for us, too. Their victory was our victory. The peace they won they won for us.

"The liberties they fought for were our liberties as well as the liberties of the peoples of the Old World. And if you, who have made sacrifices of your own in your own way during the war, have surrendered or consented to the surrender of your personal liberties, have permitted the withdrawal one by one, almost imperceptibly, of the precious individual rights that victory and peace have guaranteed to other peoples or other nations, then these men whom we honor to-day have died in vain. If liberty, national liberty, personal liberty, dies on this continent, it can never live in any other.

"We have here performed a duty to the dead. We honor ourselves in honoring them. But we have a duty still to perform for the living, for ourselves, and our descendants, and with the example of these brave men before us, let us leave to-day with the determination that this victory we celebrate is an American victory, that this peace we glory in is an American peace, and that under this victory and under this peace the honest sentiment of the plain American people shall dominate the Government under which we live."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 22, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

658. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a request for the enactment of legislation providing for the extension of the availability of certain appropriations to permit the settlement of claims of foreign nationals (H. By Mr. TEMPLE: A bill (H. R. 12117) granting a pension to James A. Moninger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 12118) granting a pension to Mahala E. Broadbent; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

6035. By the SPEAKER (by request): Resolutions adopted by the Presbytery of San Francisco at Livermore, Calif., urging the passage of House Joint Resolution 131 and Senate Joint Resolution 31; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

6040. Also (by request), resolution adopted by the Presbytery of San Francisco at Livermore, Calif., indorsing House bill 9753, to secure Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

6042. By Mr. RYAN: Petitions of John Hillock, 401 West Thirtieth Street; David Lyons, 440 West Forty-fourth Street; Frederick Buckhotz, 459 West Forty-ninth Street; and Charles F. Hillock, 401 West Thirtieth Street, all of New York City, urging the passage of the Fairfield bill relative to the retirement of Federal employees; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

6043. Also, petition of George A. Phillips, 764 Ninth Avenue, New York City, urging the passage of the Fairfield bill relative to retirement of Federal employees; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

6044. By Mr. WILLIAMSON: Resolution adopted by the Federal Employees' Union, No. 188, of Rosebud, S. Dak., urging the passage of an act providing for the continuance of the increased compensation pending the going into effect of the proposed reclassification of Federal employees; to the Committee on Appropriations.

6045. By Mr. WOODS of Virginia: Petition of residents of the State of Virginia protesting against the proposed duty on cotton gloves; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 22, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McCumber	Simmons
Borah	Hale	McKellar	Smith
Cameron	Harreld	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Caraway	Harrison	Moses	Stanley
Culberson	Heflin	Myers	Sterling
Cummins	Johnson	Nelson	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Trammell
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Kellogg	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
du Pont	Keyes	Pepper	Warren
Edge	Ladd	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	La Follette	Rawson	Watson, Ind.
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Robinson	Williams
Glass	McCormick	Sheppard	Willis

Mr. SMITH. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], who are engaged in a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness. My colleague has a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I want to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. It is Senate Resolution 308, which I offered yesterday afternoon, with regard to the circulation of the speech of the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. That Senator was not in the Chamber at the time, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] asked that the resolution go over until this morning, when the Senator from Virginia could be here. The resolution calls upon every Federal reserve bank to do what the Atlanta bank has done.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I should like to know whether the matter will occasion debate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yesterday I got myself into a situation where I yielded the whole blessed day, and I am not going to yield in that way to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. If it leads to debate I shall not press its consideration at this time.

Mr. McCORMICK. Of course it will lead to debate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It is bound to lead to debate, I am afraid. Why can not the Senator wait until I conclude my 30 minutes' speech? That is all the time I intend to take.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am here and the Senator from Virginia is here at this time. It would take but a moment, I think, to dispose of the resolution. I do not think anyone will object to it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If no one else objects, I shall not object.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], I, as a member of the committee, would feel compelled to object. I do not wish to object, but I think the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency should be in the Chamber before the resolution is taken up.

Mr. HEFLIN. The chairman of the committee was in the Chamber; I saw him here just a moment ago.

Mr. EDGE. He is not in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let us lose no more time. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, some time ago a statement from the Manufacturers' Record was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Mr. Fish, of New Jersey, has requested me to incorporate in the RECORD some facts and figures touching the accuracy of that statement. I ask unanimous consent to have his statement printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOIST WITH THEIR OWN PETARD.

One of the cleverest pieces of prohibition propaganda which has seen the light in many a day has just been "put over," to use the current phrase, and to the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, belongs the credit for the accomplishment. The Record has long been noted as one of the bitterest and ablest prohibition publications in the United States, and the present achievement is in complete harmony with its past policy and performance.

It will be remembered by many readers that about five years ago a certain petition was presented to Congress praying for country-wide prohibition on physical, mental, moral, economic, social, and racial grounds. The petition was signed by 1,000 persons, most of whom could be truthfully described as leaders in business and the professions. It had been gotten up and circulated, we believe, by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, who had previously been identified with the economic phase of prohibition propaganda. The petition of 1,000 achieved much note at the time and has generally been regarded as having been a powerful factor in bringing about national prohibition.

A short time ago the Manufacturers' Record, still as aggressively prohibition as ever, but too intelligent not to perceive the waning of that cause, conceived the idea that some good, from its standpoint, might be done if the signers of this petition could be consulted. Accordingly it sent a letter to each signer, asking him if he had changed his view and other questions related to the subject. Quite naturally a great number of replies were received, indicating that the writers were still firm in the faith. A summary of the replies was gotten up by the Baltimore publication and a pamphlet containing all of the replies was printed. The summary was sent broadcast to the press throughout the country, and as it contained testimonials as to the benefits of prohibition from such men as, for instance, Elbert H. Gary, head of the Steel Trust, it received wide publicity.

The cleverness of the "stunt" lay in the knowledge undoubtedly possessed by the Manufacturers' Record that the newspapers generally would accept the impressive surface facts developed by its questionnaire and would not pay attention to some other circumstances which could only be demonstrated by probing and analysis. Judge Gary—to take one ready letter writer—is still in favor of prohibition and believes that it brings good results in efficiency from his thousands of employees. He is still also in favor of the 12-hour working day and 7-day working week and believes that they bring good results from his employees. The fact that the experience of the civilized world has long demonstrated this to be an erroneous assumption has not changed his opinion, though perhaps the plea of the President of the United States may persuade him to adopt a more humane system from which he and his men will both benefit in time.

Again, the figures presented by the Manufacturers' Record summing up the character of replies received from the signers reveal a condition that should really alarm those who hold prohibition as their first article of political faith. Remember that this was a hand-picked list; that the signers of the petition had solemnly called upon Congress to make the country "dry"; that they were all upon public record and in the minds of their fellow countrymen as demanding this revolutionary change; that, furthermore, national prohibition has not yet existed three years and that concerted efforts to enforce it have not been going on quite two and a half years. In circumstances like these men would have the strongest reasons in the world to say they had not repented—at least yet. But the poll furnished by the Manufacturers' Record shows a remarkable change among the signers of the petition, all of whom had demanded absolute prohibition. The poll follows:

	Per cent.
For prohibition in some form	98.50
Against prohibition	1.50
For strict prohibition	85.50
For beer and wine	7
Against Volstead Act	1.25
For modification of Volstead Act	.75
For high license or Government control	1
For dispensary system	.25
Undecided or noncommittal	2.75

Seven per cent of the former absolute prohibitionists already demanding beer and wine! Fourteen and a half per cent of these carefully selected "drys" now against strict prohibition! We should say that any political party which suffered such defections was in for a bad licking.

As a contrast to the partial exhibit of the Manufacturers' Record let us present the results of a questionnaire sent out in New Jersey by the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. This questionnaire was sent to business and professional men throughout the State without discriminating between known "wets" and "drys," and, indeed, without knowledge as to the opinions of the persons addressed. Of the more than 3,500 replies received, the very great majority being from employers of labor, the following is an accurate summary:

	Yes.	No.
Are you in favor of prohibition?	1,409	1,954
Are you in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment?	1,903	1,435
Do you favor the abolishment of the saloon?	2,728	585
Do you favor the sale of light wines and beers, to be sold only with meals in licensed hotels and restaurants?	1,745	1,466
Are you in favor of the sale of light wines and beers to be consumed off the premises where sold?	1,846	1,366
Are your employees more efficient because of prohibition?	1,302	1,608
If in sympathy with our association will you encourage your employees to join?	1,394	1,034

It may be added that the larger employers of labor almost invariably testified that the efficiency of their employees had not been increased by prohibition. The small employers were the ones who thought they had noticed an improvement.

It is submitted that this exhibit is far more impressive than that of the Manufacturer's Record.

BOLL WEEVIL RAVAGES.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What does the Senator from South Carolina want?

Mr. DIAL. The Senator from Indiana is so agreeable that I would like to have him yield to me for just a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is the Senator about to read an article in a newspaper?

Mr. DIAL. Oh, no. We are greatly disturbed in the South about the ravages of the boll weevil. In one of our papers there is a short description of experiments carried on in the South, and the results in the eradication of the boll weevil are splendid. The Senator from Indiana is interested in cotton goods. I merely ask to have this article printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If the Senator will have it printed without reading, I shall have no objection.

Mr. DIAL. I do not ask to have it read, but printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From The State (Columbia, S. C.), June 20, 1922.]

FURTHER EVIDENCE ON CALCIUM ARSENATE-MOLASSES MIXTURE.

To the EDITOR OF THE STATE:

During the past few days many farmers in this section have made tests with various mixtures of calcium arsenate and molasses, and in every instance with which I am familiar they are delighted with the results. On our own plantations we have experimented with several mixtures, and are now using a mixture of one-half gallon warm water in which is thoroughly mixed 1 pound of calcium arsenate and added to one-half gallon of black molasses. We have found a convenient way to apply is to use a quart bottle which is filled three-quarters full of the mixture. Cut a trench out of one side of the cork, reverse the bottle, and apply to the bud of the cotton by shaking or plunging motion, dropping two or three drops in the bud of the plant. This method requires less of the mixture per acre and keeps it thoroughly agitated all the time. We find that none of the mixture should be carried overnight as it is hard to mix the next morning. No more should be mixed than can be used during the day, and it should be thoroughly stirred before pouring into the bottle (or buckets if the mop is used).

Mr. Randolph Gillespie applied the molasses mixture to three different fields on the 12th, 13th, and 14th. This morning (the 16th) he spent more than an hour in these fields searching for weevils. He found no live weevils and no recently punctured squares. There were many weevils in the fields before the poison was applied.

Mr. J. L. Jordan was picking about 50 weevils per acre from his fields before poisoning. He poisoned on the 8th and 9th, and on the 12th and 13th he sent hands into the fields to pick weevils and the hands could find no weevils. Mr. Jordan and Mr. Middleton went into the fields themselves and looked for some time and could find none.

On Monday, the 12th instant, we poisoned the field near the Pedigreed Seed Co.'s gin and warehouses in which numerous weevils had been observed. On Wednesday we sent about 20 hands into this field, offering them 2 cents each for live weevils. A few quit pretty promptly on not finding any weevils. About 15, however, kept looking for some time, but none found a weevil after going over about 7 acres. Mr. Sharpe, who was in charge of the gang, raised the price to 5 cents per weevil, but still failed to find any. Later the price was advanced to 10 cents per weevil, and not a single hand found a weevil after searching two hours.

George J. Wilds, plant breeder of the Pedigreed Seed Co., carried out the following experiments during the past week:

Test No. 1: At 1 p. m. on the 10th instant nine hills of cotton were treated with the molasses mixture. There are two plants in each hill, and only one of the plants in each hill was treated. Twenty-one weevils were placed on these nine hills, about one-half being placed on the poisoned plants and the rest on the unpoisoned plants. At 6 p. m. the nine hills were examined, with the result that six living and six dead weevils were found on the treated plants. At 2 p. m. on the 12th the same plants were examined and two live and eight dead weevils were found. At 9 a. m. on the 14th the plants were again examined and no live weevils and 10 dead ones were found. As weevils move about considerably at this season it is assumed that all that remained on the treated hills were destroyed within the test period. The mixture used in this test was ½ gallon water, 1 gallon molasses, and 2 pounds calcium arsenate.

Test No. 2: At 1 p. m. on the 10th instant 10 hills were treated with the following mixture: 8 gallons of water, 3 gallons of molasses, and 10 pounds of calcium arsenate. And on the 10 hills 20 weevils were placed. At 6 p. m. on the same day, 4 living and 5 dead weevils were found. At 2 p. m. on the 12th 2 living and 7 dead weevils were found. At 9 a. m. on the 14th 1 live weevil and 8 dead ones were found. Mixture used above is very light and dries up quickly.

Test No. 3: Same mixture was used on test No. 3, under about the same conditions, and 75 per cent of the weevils succumbed.

Test No. 4: In test No. 4 a mixture of 5 gallons of molasses, 5 gallons of water, and 7½ pounds of calcium arsenate was used on five hills. Twenty weevils were placed on the five hills. At 8 a. m. on the 13th no living and four dead weevils were found. On the 14th, a shower having fallen during the night of the 13th, another search for weevils was made and three additional dead and no live ones were found.

The results of these experiments seem to show that where a liquid containing at least half molasses and at least three-fourths of a pound of calcium arsenate per gallon is used, 100 per cent mortality occurs within four days.

The fact that a good many of the weevils placed on the plants were unaccounted for does not modify the value of the experiment, as our experimenters observed some weevils to fly away immediately on being placed on a plant.

The cotton surrounding these experiments had not been treated with poison of any kind.

I have two letters from G. M. Norris, of Vance, Orangeburg County, who last year applied on or about June 10 a mixture of 1½ pounds calcium arsenate and 1 quart of hot water mixed with 1 gallon of molasses. He stirred the water and arsenate for 30 minutes before mixing with the molasses and applied with a mop. He says one man or boy can apply to 4 acres per day. He gathered 900 pounds of seed cotton per acre and only made 200 to 400 pounds per acre on the balance of the farm. He does not consider this test positively conclusive, owing to the fact that he had no untreated cotton in the field with treated cotton. He is confident that the poison was responsible for his comparative success in a section which was almost wiped out by the weevils last year. The cost of the mixture, Mr. Norris says, was 20 to 25 cents per acre.

All the farmers who have reported on the use of the mixture in this section agree that the cost is between 15 and 25 cents for materials. Mr. Norris reports that most of the farmers in his section are using the molasses-calcium arsenate mixture this year, and so far as he has heard they are pleased with the results.

I can not be certain that by the use of calcium arsenate-molasses treatment any farmer will make a crop of cotton, and I can only be sure that under the weather conditions we have had here since May 30 that the vast majority of the weevils have been killed and that few weevils are left in the treated fields and few punctured squares are appearing. The cost of the application is so slight and the results appear so manifest that I feel that every farmer can ill afford not to invest 20 cents per acre per application for this treatment and apply it several times at intervals of a week or 10 days. There is not the slightest question that millions of weevils have already been killed by this treatment during the past 10 days, and it stands to reason that this has done some good.

DAVID R. COKER.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it is very gratifying, indeed, to realize that at last we are to get back to the tariff. We have had a detour of some six days and are finally back on the main road. Any discussion relating to the tariff is, of course, entirely legitimate and should be indulged in, but extraneous matters, except appropriation bills, should, as far as possible, be kept out.

The Republican Party is either a protective tariff party or it is nothing. There has been a distinct line of demarcation on the tariff question between the two parties ever since the birth of the Republican Party. If we are to have party solidarity, there must be something of an agreement on the protective tariff question, and therefore as the party which has 24 majority in the Senate and is responsible for legislation I think we should bend every energy to the passage of the bill, not in hæc verba, not in the precise verbiage in which it comes from the committee, of course, but with such amendments as the Senate after debate may adopt.

The Finance Committee proposed 2,082 amendments; up to this time 516 have been acted on by the Senate, and the amendments that remain to be considered therefore number 1,566. The amendments adopted as originally proposed by the Finance Committee are 415; the amendments by which rates have been reduced upon recommendation of the Committee on Finance number 84; the amendments by which rates have been increased upon the recommendation of the Committee on Finance number 11. The amendments by which rates have been reduced by action of the Senate number 3, and the amendments by which rates have been increased by action of the Senate number 3.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether the 2,082 amendments include all amendments reported by the Finance Committee or include only amendments of importance? The Senator understands that a large number of the amendments actually reported by the Committee on Finance are merely formal, a considerable number of them being mere verbal changes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me answer the Senator from Arkansas by saying that the experts have furnished me this statement showing that the total number of committee amendments proposed is 2,082.

Mr. ROBINSON. That, then, includes all of the committee amendments?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, can the Senator from Indiana segregate from the total list of amendments the number of amendments which might by anyone be considered important and state the number of amendments to the substance of the bill? The Senator smiles, but the Senator is bound to see the force of my inquiry. There are, perhaps, one-half of the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance which have no importance, and no contest has arisen or will arise concerning them. I recall that some of them relate to striking out a word and rewriting it with a comma following it. There have been, perhaps, some 50 instances during the consideration of the pending bill when that sort of an amendment has been proposed by the committee and has been passed upon. There are also a large number of amendments which are merely verbal and which have no important relation to the substance of the bill.

What I want to know is, if the Senator from Indiana can state it, the number of substantial amendments which the Finance Committee proposes, the number that the committee has receded from during the course of the debate, and the number that have been adhered to.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can not answer that question. As to whether or not an amendment is important depends on the viewpoint of the Senator who offers it or who discusses it.

Mr. ROBINSON. In that connection, the Senator would not consider a mere change of punctuation, unless it changed the meaning of a sentence, important? The Senator would not consider a change of the spelling of a word important? Many of the changes which the Committee on Finance has proposed are purely verbal, and I do not think any Senator would consider perhaps a third or a half of the amendments reported by the Finance Committee as substantial amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What the Senator from Arkansas desires to know is the number of amendments which affect the rates in the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. I refer to amendments which either affect the rates or other important provisions. Of course, the amendment affecting the basis of valuation, whether it shall be American valuation or foreign valuation, is a very important amendment. The provision relating to the power of the President to increase rates under given conditions is also an important amendment. Certainly, however, no mere change in punctuation, unless it affects a change in the meaning of the language employed, could be considered important. The mere striking out of a word and the substitution of a more appropriate word would not be considered important.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas as to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know from my studies of the bill, and the Senator from Indiana is bound to know, that a very large number—the exact proportion of them I can not accurately state, but I suggest approximately one-half—of the 2,082 amendments which have been reported by the Finance Committee are of an unimportant character from the standpoint of any Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, judging from the length of the discussion which has been indulged in by Senators on practically every one of the amendments, except those relating to the mere verbiage or punctuation, they have all been considered of sufficient importance to excite the volubility of certain Senators.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that statement of the Senator from Indiana is not illuminating as to the question that I have asked. On yesterday when an amendment relating to trace chains, I believe, was under consideration Senators on the other side of the Chamber consumed six or eight hours in the discussion of entirely irrelevant issues and did not mention the pending amendment. That has been true throughout the whole debate. Some of the discussion of irrelevant topics has come from this side, but the greater proportion of it recently has come from the majority side of the Chamber. However, no analysis of this bill or the progress which has been made on it that is dependent merely upon the number of amendments disposed of reflects any true light upon the issues that have been determined, because the large majority of the amendments, or at least approximately one-half of the amendments already disposed of, have not been important, and one-half of the amendments yet remaining to be disposed of are not important, and no discussion will occur concerning them.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I trust that the prophecy made by my friend from Arkansas will be verified, and that the great majority of the amendments which have been reported by the Committee on Finance and are yet to be considered will not excite debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me have an understanding with my friend from Indiana. Does the Senator controvert the correctness of the statement of fact which I have just made, and does he dispute my statement that a large number of the amendments that have been reported by the Finance Committee and which are embraced in the total of the 2,082 to which he has referred are not important and have not provoked discussion and will not provoke discussion?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not dispute that. I have not at any time said that I dispute it. I have simply stated the number of amendments which have been proposed by the Finance Committee, the number that have been acted on up to this time, the number which have involved an increase of rates, and the number which have involved a decrease of rates. That was all there was to the statement which I made.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question before he continues? I did not get precisely the number of the amendments which he stated. How many amendments did the Senator say the Finance Committee had been forced, since the reporting of the bill originally, to change and to reduce the rates under the fire of the minority side of the Chamber?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not one.

Mr. HARRISON. How many amendments since the bill was originally reported from the Finance Committee have been changed by amendments being offered at the instance of the Finance Committee and the rates reduced as originally carried in the bill as reported to the Senate?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There have been 84 such changes.

Mr. HARRISON. That action was taken by the Senate after full consideration and after the iniquitous provisions of the bill had been revealed by Members on the Democratic side of the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My friend from Mississippi flatters himself. The amendments very largely were the result of the deliberations of the Committee on Finance itself. Occasionally, or semioccasionally, rather, a helpful suggestion may have come from the other side. That has not occurred very often and the suggestions have not been very illuminating, but, after all, sometimes sufficient to put the committee upon inquiry. Senators must remember that at the outset of the discussion on this bill it was stated the committee were not infallible and that there had been mistakes made; that because of shifting values, because of changing prices, because of chaotic conditions, they could not precisely say what the difference was in the cost of conversion, and therefore, as a matter of course, the committee were compelled to change their views with reference to those matters not in any very great respect, and, after all, simply as to the rate, not as to the principle involved. That is all there is to that proposition. Changes will continue to be made because of the existence of these very conditions. Even in the old days when the Dingley law was framed and when the Payne-Aldrich law was formulated the committee made many changes after the bills were reported because they acquired additional information on the subject; but at this time, when the whole world is chaotic, when industry can not put it foot upon anything that is finally solid, there must of course be changes from time to time to make the tariff what we think it ought to be—adequately protective of American industry.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a few days ago bore witness to the difficulties which every Ways and Means Committee and every Finance Committee confront, and testified that no tariff bill could be written which was infallible and in which mistakes were not made.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I think something like a thousand amendments were recommended by the Chairman of the Finance Committee in 1913 in the framing of the Underwood-Simmons law.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My recollection is that the number was something in excess of a thousand; but, be that as it may, these are the conditions that confront the committee. We have been dealing with those conditions as best we could under those circumstances that surrounded us, and we shall continue to deal with those conditions as best we may under the circumstances that surround us.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator as to the more than 100 amendments which the Finance Committee have brought in, is it not true that practically all of them have been brought in during the last few weeks and that until we had finished the chemical schedule and the earthenware schedule the committee did not begin daily to bring in amendments reducing rates?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not recall precisely when the earthenware schedule was considered, but I do know that the committee has been meeting every morning at 9.30 without the loss of a day and when other matters were before the Senate the committee has been sitting all day for the purpose of acquiring additional information, for the purpose of hearing Senators who claimed to have additional information and who, as a rule, have illuminated the subject which they discussed. We have been doing the very best we could to get all the information possible. We have gone everywhere we could to find the facts so as to change the rates if we found it necessary to change the rates in order to make the kind of a tariff bill we started out to make. That we shall continue to do until the end, however far off the end may be.

It repeatedly has been stated on the floor by those who are opposing this measure that wages are as high in Europe as they were in 1914 and that because of that fact some of these rates were excessive. Mr. President, the statistics show that an ounce of gold purchases 17.22 hours of labor in the United States, 50.16 hours of labor in Great Britain, 95.50 hours of labor in Japan, 117.31 hours in France, and 201.66 hours in Germany. These facts are not disputed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator quote the source of his statistics?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; the statistics come from the English Parliament and have been indorsed, according to my understanding, by our own Tariff Commission. That is my understanding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator quote the source of that information?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I did not ask, but in the committee it was understood that the Tariff Commission had seen these figures and had indorsed them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, may I inquire, also, as to the date when those figures would be applicable?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. On the 1st of February.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of this year, I assume?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And from all countries at the same time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not understand the purport of the Senator's question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I mean the same date applies to each country?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is my understanding of the statistics, and I think they are absolutely reliable. I do not think there is a question in the world about their authenticity.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator state also to what line of occupation those figures relate? The Senator doubtless knows that wages vary in the different lines of occupation in every country in the world.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding is that these figures were collated from five of the key industries in the various countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If I may ask one more question, were the figures the Senator has just quoted used as the basis for framing the pending bill in the Finance Committee?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They were not. They merely authenticate the other information we had along the same line; they simply back up the facts and the figures in our possession.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what information he did have when he made up the bill?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator knows that it is just as impossible for me to answer that question under a three or four day speech as it would be to fly. We were literally months in collecting the information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has referred to some information that came in subsequent to the formation of the bill——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Some information; certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator please give us the source of the information of the committee prior to the formation of the bill?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We had information constantly. We began the consideration of the tariff bill away back over a year ago. We heard witness after witness, dozens of them and scores of them, experts from every one of the departments, from the Tariff Commission and the Treasury Department, expert appraisers, together with the importers and their representatives, who came before us, and they are not backward about coming.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has been stated here upon the floor that there was no knowledge as to the cost of labor abroad.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, Mr. President, who stated that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Several Senators on the other side have made the admission.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Who?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not recall just at the present time. I do not like to hold anyone responsible, but we have asked for it. We have asked if this bill was made up upon the theory of compensating for the difference in the cost of labor at home and abroad, and it has been stated that they did not know what that difference was; that the statistics were lacking; and I now ask the Senator, if he had them prior to the making up of the bill, to state what they were, and he says he has not them.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The idea of the Senator standing up here on the floor of the United States Senate and asking me, as a member of the Finance Committee, to furnish him the facts upon which we formulated this bill! Why, I could not do that under two weeks if I were to try my level best. The Senator knows that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has given the figures which they received subsequently to making up the bill, and all I am asking is for him to give the figures which they had prior to the making up of the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We had a vast volume of figures and data that we acquired from every available and accessible source, and upon that basis we formulated this bill, and as fast as we acquire additional knowledge on the subject we will change the provisions of the bill to conform to that additional knowledge. That is all I can say to the Senator—that we have been formulating it along the line of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, which is the fundamental basis of a protective tariff system.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then let me ask the Senator whether the figures which he has just read, representing, as he thinks, the difference in the cost of labor in Europe and in the United States, are substantially the same figures which the committee used in making up this bill?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will not say that they were, because we did not have those figures at that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In what respect did they differ?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can not answer that question, because that would involve the statement of details which I am not here to discuss and which would involve a very long discussion if I were to go into the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has practically admitted that they had no figures before the bill was made up.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I can not understand the insistent repetition of the Senator, contrary to all the facts that he knows very well existed and do exist. The Senator knows that we did not just get off in a corner and make up a tariff bill without any information, without ever having asked anybody about it. He knows just as well as I know, who sat there and heard the evidence, that we had testimony from everywhere. My honorable friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], attended these meetings. He heard these witnesses testify, one after another, dozens and scores of them. Many times the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was also present, and frequently the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. They heard this testimony, very great volumes of it; and after that testimony had been adduced before the committee we proceeded to formulate the bill, and after that other people continued to come, and Senators came and Representatives came and business men came and importers came, and we continued to gather additional data and additional information, which, to the very best of our ability, we incorporated from time to time in the schedules. That is all I am going to say about that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will not yield any further on that point, because it is absolutely useless to discuss that sort of thing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was not going to refer to the point suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, but I did want to make just one further inquiry. To what extent have these wages varied during the past year? And upon what ratio are those wages increasing from month to month?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not greatly. They have varied somewhat, of course, in all European countries; likewise in our own. Wages in many of the industries in America are not as high as they were. We all know that. Wages in many of the countries of Europe are somewhat higher than they were. The Senator must remember that the question of depreciated currency enters into this whole proposition, and enters into it in a way that can not be avoided. Because instead of having a normal value of 24 cents, the mark to-day has a value of one-half cent or less, measured in gold. Those things all enter into this question of the tariff, and all enter into the question of conversion costs, and all must be taken into consideration in coming to a conclusion as to conversion costs in these rival commercial countries.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator is quite right in that statement. I merely wanted to suggest that in the country which is usually referred to in this connection wages have been increasing by large percentages from month to month, and that increase is going on to-day, and that any statement which the Senator may make with respect to wages on the 1st of February, at least as to Germany, has no special significance with regard to conditions there to-day, and by the time this bill becomes a law conditions will be entirely different from what they were on the 1st of February or from what they are to-day, as the Senator doubtless will admit.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, there is not any question but that there are changing values and shifting costs about the world. That is the reason why, from time to time, the committee, after hearing the testimony, have somewhat changed rates in order to conform to this new condition that they have found to exist, which is the wise and sane thing to do. That is why, until the conclusion of this bill, we may continue to change some of these rates so as to measure as nearly as possible the difference in conversion costs in these rival commercial and industrial countries. Further than that I can not say. Further than that nobody can say. We started out with that in view. We have not been deflected from our course, nor shall we be until the conclusion of our deliberations.

Mr. President, as an instance of cheap production abroad, Republican Senators, working through the Treasury Department, brought to Washington a large number of articles made in foreign countries. These could be indefinitely multiplied, running into the thousands, if we cared to bring them here, covering almost every phase of manufacturing activity, and running along all lines of industrial usefulness; but we have brought here what, in a short space of time, we thought we could present to the Senate as evidence, first, of cheap production abroad, and, secondly, of the large profits made by importing houses in the United States, thereby giving the country to understand the eagerness and the intensity of the propaganda that is being circulated throughout the country against the passage of this bill.

I have had some knowledge of tariff legislation in this country for 30 years; and while, of course, the opposition has always been from the same source, while the importers have always objected to the enactment of a protective tariff and probably always will, nevertheless it has been more insistent this time than ever before. It has been more extensive and more intensive than I have ever known it to be in my experience; and that is why we have these resolutions passed everywhere, and that is why we have these petitions sent to us from various stores and houses throughout the country, coming to us almost every day, petitions already printed and signed below by large numbers of citizens. The people did not get up those petitions. They were sent out by these importing houses to the retail stores, and they put them on their counters, and they asked everybody that came in to sign them, and everybody signed, because they simply made the statement, just as our Democratic friends have always made the statement whenever a tariff bill was under consideration, that the tariff was a tax, and that it was added to the price that the consumer would have to pay, and that it would therefore necessitate an increase in the cost of living, and all that sort of thing; and people hastily signed petitions and resolutions of every kind, without waiting to give the tariff bill an opportunity to justify itself or giving its provisions a chance to show what will be worked out under their operation.

I challenge directly the statement that this bill will add measurably to the cost of living or to the cost of commodities in the United States. I can not go into that in detail, because it is far afield from what I started out to talk about.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not want to yield now, because I am going on to the thing I want to talk about. Nothing gives me greater pleasure than to yield to my friend when it is opportune, but if I get into a general discussion of the tariff here—which I like as well as I like anything in the world—I shall be kept here the whole day discussing these matters, and not get down to the thing that I came to present to the Senate this particular morning.

My friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the chairman of the committee, the other day presented a number of these articles. I shall present some this morning. Other Senators from time to time will present other articles for the purpose of showing the cheapness of production abroad, and the further fact that the American people, even under the present Underwood-Simmons law, are not deriving the benefit from cheap goods that they ought to derive if they come in thus cheaply and without the imposition of a protective tariff rate.

For instance, I hold here a shotgun. [Exhibiting.] I do not know much about shotguns. I will hold it up this way. I do not think it will go off, I will say to my friend from Nebraska. He suggests that I point it at the press gallery. No; I have too many friends up there. I do not want to shoot anybody.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, is the Senator going to use that shotgun to reinforce his argument?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Absolutely; and I think it will if my friend will patiently listen to me.

Mr. President, this gun was manufactured in Germany. The foreign cost was $1.80.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Wait until I finish.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator says the foreign cost was $1.80.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I made a mistake in that. I did not look at the figures right. The foreign cost was 90 cents. The landed cost, including the duty, was $1.80.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The question of amount is wholly immaterial to the point which I had in mind. Was the article bought for cents at all? Was the article contracted for and purchased for so many cents?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; measured in gold.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is exactly the way we buy abroad.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is entirely a different question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; it is the same question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will venture to assert that the party who bought the gun did not pay 90 cents for it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. How much did he pay?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not know what he paid.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And from what the Senator from Indiana says I apprehend he does not know.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do know.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But I venture to assert that the contract for that gun was made for so many marks.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, that is not true at all. We have the actual invoice and the invoice price.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not in cents.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. This is the invoice price given by the man that brought it here to the appraising officer.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Without impugning the motives or good intention or good faith of the Senator from Indiana, I challenge his statement. I ask him to produce the invoice, and the Senator will find upon an examination of the invoice that the goods were not billed out in dollars and cents at all. I ask him to produce the invoice.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not the invoice, but we have the authority from the Secretary of the Treasury to get the invoice if these figures are challenged.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The figures are challenged, and I am challenging them upon the information, which has been uniform, that such purchases were made in marks and not in dollars and cents at all. When Senators rise here and talk about these articles being purchased in Germany for so many cents it is misleading, and I call upon the Senator from Indiana, before he proceeds further, to produce his invoices, and they will show that the articles were not purchased or contracted for in gold.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will wait a minute and give me a chance to teli him something, I will do so. These figures are taken from the invoices furnished by the importers, directly from the invoices themselves. They recite what they paid for this article in dollars and cents.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In dollars and cents.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I challenge that statement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not care whether the Senator does or not; the appraiser has given me the facts.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Indiana, I know, is speaking in good faith, but I challenge the accuracy of his statement, and I call for proof.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can get the invoices right from the appraising office, if the Senator wants them. I can have them right here and furnish them, to show that the man who imported this gun paid that price for it in dollars and cents, and said so in the invoice itself; and that is all there is to it. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator's information is undoubtedly inaccurate, because doubtless at the time that importation was made such goods were always contracted for in marks. The date of the purchase is important, the date of contract is important, and the Senator is misled in this, that under the law the cost of the article at the time of exportation is required to be taken as the price of the foreign article, but they may have been contracted for a year previously, or six months previously, and the purchaser may have bought his foreign exchange at an entirely different price; but the Senator has doubtless taken the foreign exchange value of the foreign money at the date of the exportation of the article, and it may or may not mean the cost of the article as measured in gold. I venture to assert that the Senator has not a single article upon the desk before him which was billed out by the foreign exporter in dollars and cents.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, this is my speech, and not that of the Senator from New Mexico. We have listened to him for months, and I am going to talk a little while in my own time, if my friend will permit me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the Senator will agree that he has been very much enlightened by what I have said on different occasions.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not a great deal, I will say to my friend from New Mexico, because he has been shooting wide of the mark, wider than I would shoot, probably, if I undertook to use this gun. The fact about it is that the importer makes out his own invoice in dollars and cents. How can an importer make out an invoice in marks and get through the New York appraising office with it? He could not do it. He makes it out in American money, in dollars and cents, and that is exactly what the duty is levied on. That is true in this case, and in the case of every other article I shall present. This gun cost in Germany 90 cents in American money. The landed cost, including the duty, was $1.80. The retail price was $15. The spread between the cost in Germany and the retail price was 1,566 per cent. The percentage of retail price to landed cost was 733 per cent. It was bought from J. L. Galeb, of New York City, on Chambers Street, in May. Here is the receipt taken over the counter for the money paid. There is no escape from that proposition, from the beginning to the end.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I will let the Senator ask me a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would like to ask the Senator to give us the retail cost of a comparable gun produced in America.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That I can not do, and do not pretend to be able to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then let me ask the Senator another question. Does he think that the vendor of that foreign-made gun could have obtained a price of $15 for it in the American market if a like American gun, produced in America, was not being sold in the American market at retail for that much or more?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In this speech I am not going off into the wild realms of speculation to determine what might or might not happen under other conditions than those which exist. What I am showing absolutely is this: First, the cheapness of production abroad, which is denied here; secondly, the immense profit made by those profiteering importing houses, which accounts for the strength and intensity of their propaganda against this bill; thirdly, the influence they have as advertisers over a few of our newspaper friends in the city of New York.

I come next to this clock, which is a very handsome work of art. [Exhibiting.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that gun——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will have to yield to my friend.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to ask the Senator a very brief question, and it will not require any argument. As I understand, the present duty upon that gun is about 200 per cent of its cost, is it not?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The duty and the landed charges.

Mr. LODGE. And the freight?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The freight, insurance, and duty, 100 per cent.

Mr. STANLEY. I thought the Senator said it was $1.80, and that the gun cost 90 cents.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not the rate of percentage. The Senator can look that up.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the Senator a statement of what the duty is less the landing charge?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No. I did not permit that to be put in this statement, because I did not want to encumber the record with it. I do not care anything about it for the purposes of my argument.

Mr. STANLEY. Has the Senator any idea about how many hundred per cent would be adequate protection on that gun?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator does not know what he wants, then?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. This gun comes in under the Underwood Act now.

Mr. STANLEY. Exactly; but to what extent would the Senator change the law in order to keep that gun out? How many thousand per cent does the Senator want?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will answer that question by and by. The next article is this 400-day clock; that is, it runs 400 days without being wound more than once. This clock was also made in Germany. The foreign cost was $1.70, American money. The landed cost, including the duty, was $2.21. The retail price was $30. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 1,661 per cent. Percentage of retail price to landed cost was 1,257 per cent. It was bought of Peter Korn, New York City. There is the receipt for it. It was bought on the 18th day of May for $30.

Mr. SIMMONS. What did the Senator say the landed cost was?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I did not say what the landed cost was. I said the landed cost including the duty was $2.21.

The next article to which I desire to call attention is this watch, which was also made in Germany. [Exhibiting.] The foreign cost was 17 cents. The landed cost, including the duty, was 22.9 cents. The retail price was $1. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 468 per cent. The percentage of retail price to landed cost was 335 per cent. It was bought of George Daly Co., New York, in May of this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the landed cost?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The landed cost was 22.9 cents. This belt which I hold in my hand [exhibiting] was made in England. It is described as a "gent's cowhide belt." The foreign cost was 47.7 cents. The landed cost was 65 cents. The retail price was $2. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 319 per cent. The percentage of retail price to landed cost was 208 per cent. It was bought of Martin & Martin, New York, 618 Fifth Avenue, on the 22d day of this month.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator advise us whether these stores in which these purchases were made were the importers?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Practically every store the name of which I have given the Senator was the importer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator be kind enough hereafter to specify?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can not give the Senator that information, because it was not furnished to me, but my understanding is that practically every one of these stores is an importing store, and that in no instance was there more than one transfer, so my information is, from the importing store to the retail store that sold it; but, so far as I am concerned, that does not make any difference, because these figures show the tremendous spread between production cost and the retail selling price in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator maintain that the sale of these imported articles at these enormous profits tends to destroy American industries which sell them at the same prices?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; where there is an enormous spread between the two, if we put a tariff on, and if as a result of that tariff certain wages are paid, and we have certain conversion costs of these articles in the United States, then, because there is that enormous profit, they can simply lower the price and undersell our people. If we could be absolutely sure that they would never sell at a less price than this, we would not be subjected to the same danger, though these importers would continue to make enormous profits; but the big point is that if we were to fix rates which would permit a comparable watch of American make to be sold at that price in New York the result would be that the importer could get under that price, still reap an enormous harvest, undersell us, and compel a reduction in American wages.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. JONES of New Mexico rose.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I decline to yield. I am going to finish this speech, if I can.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator yield, so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina. I can not very well avoid yielding to him; the Senator is the ranking member of the Committee on Finance on the Democratic side.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not abuse the courtesy of the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understand that; the Senator never does.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to ask the Senator if he will not give the prices charged for American-made articles comparable to those he is now exhibiting and commenting on—what the American manufacturer's price is?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. And what the retail price is of those particular articles.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not know, I will say to my friend, the price of the comparable American article. I did not look it up, and for the purposes that I have in mind it does not make any difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the retailer is charging as much profit upon the American manufactured article as he is charging upon the foreign manufactured article, does not the Senator see that that would be very important information?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no. I am not assuming, as my friend from North Carolina is assuming, that wages in the United States are as low as they are in Germany or that production costs in the United States are as low as they are in Germany. We know better than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why did not the Senator, when he was getting the foreign manufacturer's price with duty added, for the purpose of aiding the committee and the Senate in reaching a just conclusion about the matter, also get the American manufacturer's price for the same article?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Because that was far apart from the thought I had in mind, far apart from the thought that all had in mind when we brought these articles here. We want to show the cheapness of production abroad. We want to show the enormous spread between the foreign production cost and the American selling price in order to show the enormous profits gotten by the importing houses, all of which shows their reason for establishing and spreading this enormous propaganda against the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I next take up an aluminum sauce pot [exhibiting] which was made in Germany. The foreign cost was 29.7 cents; the landed cost, 40.3 cents; the retail price, $1.24. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 317 per cent and the percentage of retail price to landed cost 208 per cent. The article was bought of R. H. Macy & Co., of New York, on the 15th day of May and I have here the receipt taken for the money paid over the counter.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Well, I will yield to my good friend from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. I appreciate the graciousness of the Senator from Indiana. I realize that he prefers to go on with his speech and I interrupt him with some hesitancy, but I feel it is important that we should understand each other as we go along. Does the Senator know and can he advise the Senate as to the source of the raw material from which that aluminum pot was made, whether in this country or in Germany?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It was made in Germany.

Mr. STANLEY. Have they their own aluminum there? Does the Senator know and can the Senator advise me whether the raw material from which the pot was made was obtained in Germany or in this country?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding is that it was obtained in Germany. I have not any doubt about that.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator know the cost of producing that aluminum pot in this country?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not.

Mr. STANLEY. If it transpires that the aluminum from which that pot is made or the same substance was made in this country by one single corporation, one great concern making practically all of it, and if it transpires that there is no material difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad, then this high price is the result of a monopoly in this country or it could not get that price for the retailed article.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator is assuming something which is impossible of existence; that is to say, that it would not cost any more to manufacture that pot in the United States than it would in Germany. We know better than that. I do not need to go into that question, because it has not any bearing on the situation; that is to say, it throws no light on the subject I am discussing before the Senate. The Senator can look up, if he pleases, the conversion cost in the United States and then make his comparisons. I do not care anything about it. I know that if we were not to put on a tariff sufficiently high to protect the American manufacturer as against his German competitor, where that saucepan was made, and if we were to bring the American article up to that price in the New York market, the importers would immediately lower the price and undersell us because of the enormous profit they are getting, and they would put our manufacturers out of business quite the same as if we were to go on under the freedom of the Underwood-Simmons law and give them a free hand.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I do not know that there is such a difference in the cost of production or I would not have asked the Senator. I do know, for instance, taking the pressed glass in the clock on the desk before the Senator—that is, I have every reason to believe from the testimony of glassmakers—that we can make a pressed-glass receiver as cheaply in this country as they can in Germany. We can make a bottle as cheaply——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Now, I do not want my friend to inject a speech of that kind into the midst of my speech, because it has not a thing in the world to do with the matter I am discussing—not to say generally, but it has not a thing in the world to do with the particular matter I am now presenting. I am discussing this aluminum sauce pot; I am discussing the production cost abroad; I am discussing the enormous profits made by profiteers in the United States; and I am discussing the reason why they have injected themselves into this propaganda against the tariff all over the country by men and by money. That is what I am discussing and that is all I care about. In other words, the whole thing is happening at the present time under the Underwood-Simmons law, which is practically a free-trade law out of which the people of the United States get nothing and out of which we do not hope to get anything.

Mr. STANLEY. What I wish to call to the attention of the Senator is that unless he shows, as he proceeds, a difference in the cost of producing those articles here and abroad, he is simply demonstrating the fact that these enormous prices are obtained from the consumer by virtue of the fact that the manufacturers and retailers in this country, in violation of every law against combinations and in restraint of trade and monopoly, are charging enormous prices and are practicing an amazing extortion upon the body of the people, and the Senator is proposing to shut away from them the only avenue for competition.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Now, Mr. President, I knew that my friend wanted to inject a free-trade speech into the body of my remarks. I very good-naturedly permitted him to do that. I might take an hour to answer that argument. It would not take an hour to answer it, but it might take me an hour to convince my friend. It has not anything on earth to do with the question I am presenting, not the slightest in the world. I am not going to be diverted further.

I wish next to take up a padlock [exhibiting]. Perhaps it ought to be put on the mouths of some of us. This padlock was made in Germany. The foreign cost was 19.6 cents. The landed cost, including the duty, 25.8 cents; retail price, $1; percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 410 per cent; percentage of retail price to landed cost, 288 per cent. Bought of Louis Wright, New York, on the 26th of May, and I have here the receipt for the money paid over the counter.

Next is a very beautiful bird cage [exhibiting]. I feel like holding an auction to see whether or not I could sell this to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I am told the decorations on this bird cage are hand painted. I would not know whether they are or not. The foreign cost of this magnificent bird cage was $1.20; landed cost, including duty, $1.74; retail price, $11; percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 817 per cent; percentage of retail price to landed cost, 532 per cent. Bought of E. W. Stoffregn in New York, and here is the receipt for $11 paid over the counter on the 24th day of last month.

Next is a folding rule [exhibiting] made in Germany. The foreign cost was nine-tenths of 1 cent; the landed cost, including duty, 11.4 cents; retail price, 25 cents; percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 177 per cent; percentage of retail price to landed cost, 120 per cent. Bought of the New York Central Supply Co., city of New York, on the 26th of May, the receipt being here for the money paid over the counter.

Next is this electric hair dryer [exhibiting], for which my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] unfortunately has no use. The foreign cost of this article is $2.75; the landed cost, including the duty, $3.57; the retail price, $17.50; the percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 536 per cent; percentage of retail price to landed cost, 378 per cent. Bought of the Knickerbocker Electroleer Co., in New York, on the 26th day of May, the receipt being here attached. It will now be in order for our friends to talk about how the women of the country are going to be oppressed by reason of the tariff we are imposing on various articles coming into this country from abroad.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I would just like to inquire something about the purchase. I imagine if some of the good women of the country to whom the Senator has just referred were doing the purchasing there might not be such a large profit.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am not going to yield for any such purpose. Of course, I suppose if a woman goes to buy an article it will be sold to her at a lower price while if a man goes to buy the same article he will be charged a higher price. If my friend is content with that kind of argument, I am quite content that he shall make it, and I will let it pass without any further comment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there is any such great spread as that and if the article is not worth the price, if the American comparable article is not selling at the same price, does not the Senator think the discriminating purchaser could have done better?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am not going off into any question about a discriminating purchaser. That has not a thing on earth to do with the fundamental principle involved here. Whether or not a man buys an article for what it is worth or pays more than it is worth in a store on Pennsylvania Avenue, I do not care. That has not a thing in the world to do with the fundamental question involved which I am presenting here and to which there is no answer. I care not about the cost of conversion in the United States. It does not apply, because, as I have stated over and over again, under the Underwood law, now in existence and which Senators on the other side of the Chamber are attempting to perpetuate with all the force they have and without change, these articles are coming in and these enormous profits are being made, and if our conversion costs were so great that the prices——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That the prices of the foreign product, as I have said over and over again, were to equal the price that——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator wait until I finish my sentence? The Senator is so anxious to make a speech that he will not even wait until I, who have the floor, complete my sentences.

I have stated over and over again that under the Underwood-Simmons law, which Senators on the other side of the aisle are trying to perpetuate, these articles are coming in and that these enormous profits are being made. If it really cost as much or if we put on a tariff that would make it cost as much for us to manufacture that article, what would the result be? The result would be that the foreigner would simply lower his price, which he could do under these enormous profits, as I shall show later on.

Now, if my good friend from New Mexico will possess his soul in patience until a little later on, I shall undertake to answer one or two of his inquiries.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am trying to be patient, but I just wonder if the Senator would answer it now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; not now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator does not care to be interrupted——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not care to be interrupted at this particular point.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have here [exhibiting] a bottle of Apollinaris water, for which there is still some use in the country. That was produced in Germany. The cost of it was 2.4 cents; the landed cost, including the duty, was 5.7 cents; the retail price, 24 cents; the spread between the foreign cost and the retail price, 900 per cent; the spread between the landed cost and the retail price, 336 per cent. It was bought of Park & Tilford, New York, on the 31st day of May. Here [exhibiting] is the receipt for it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, they must have been bell boys if they paid 24 cents for a split of Apollinaris.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They probably were not born in Kentucky, but I only know that they paid that price. Here [exhibiting] is the receipt for it, which I exhibit to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to know if the Senator from Indiana knows what profit was charged by the dealer in the other articles used in connection with Apollinaris water?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is a matter of ancient recollection.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator from Indiana know what we pay for the Apollinaris water?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not buy any.

Mr. STANLEY. What is the difference between the price of Apollinaris water and White Rock water, which is supplied in the Senate cloak room?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not know. I do not drink any.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator does not drink water?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; not Apollinaris water. I take my water straight.

Mr. President, I have here a package of cabbage seed. The foreign cost of this article is 1.2 cents for one-quarter of an ounce; the landed cost, including the duty, is 1.5 cents; the retail price is 35 cents; the percentage of the retail price to the foreign cost is 2,891 per cent; the percentage of the retail price to the landed cost is 2,233 per cent. This was bought of Stumpp & Walter, New York City. Here [exhibiting] is the receipt which was given for the purchase price.

Here [exhibiting] is a toy—union-stone building blocks. It is very heavy; I shall not open the box, but shall content myself with simply showing it. The blocks were made in Germany. The foreign cost was 21.7 cents; the landed cost, including the duty, 35 cents; the retail price, $4; the percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 1,743 per cent; the percentage of retail price to landed cost, 1,042 per cent. Bought of F. A. O. Schwarz Co., Fifth Avenue and Thirty-first Street, on the 6th day of June, and the receipt accompanies it.

Now I come to something that I know will excite the risibilities of my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who does me the honor of listening to me.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the organ grinder proceed.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I noticed yesterday that my friend came over here and very critically examined this toy monkey. I saw him here during my absence from my desk. He examined it, and I thought perhaps he might be interested in the addresses that William Jennings Bryan had been making recently in which Mr. Bryan is attempting to convince the American people that there is nothing in the theory of evolution and that neither he nor his ancestors descended from the monkey in accordance with the Darwinian theory of evolution. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that I have not any intention at all of saying anything about the ancestry of the Democratic Party and that he need not have given himself such great concern by coming over here and examining this article; but had our mutual friend William Jennings Bryan any idea of the vast profit that could be made out of a stuffed imitation of a monkey, I do not think he would have taken such great umbrage at the thought of our descent from the real simian article.

This monkey "schuco"—I do not pretend to know what "schuco" means, but I am informed by the expert that it is a trade name—was produced in Germany. The foreign cost was 19 cents; the landed cost was 31 cents; the retail cost was $2; the spread between the foreign cost and the retail price was 952 per cent; the spread between the landing cost and the retail price was 545 per cent. This is a toy. My friend from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] one day here waxed very eloquent about the boy's jackknife and what we proposed to do with the boy's jackknife by our iniquitous tariff bill. I wonder what he will say about the profit on this harmless toy for the little child who wants a toy monkey with which to play, and these other toys—the union blocks, and so forth. I might multiply their number indefinitely and refer to dozens of different kinds of toys as to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who understands this question probably better than anybody else, says it would take a thousand or fifteen hundred or even two thousand per cent, if we imposed a direct rate on these imports of toys coming from abroad, in order to protect the American manufacturer in the enjoyment of the American market.

The next article is unperfumed toilet soap [exhibiting]. It comes from France. The foreign cost was 10 cents; the landed cost, including the duty, 13 cents; the retail price, 60 cents; the percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 500 per cent; the percentage of the retail price to landed cost, 361 per cent.

The next is a toothbrush [exhibiting], which was made in Japan. The foreign cost was 11.2 cents; the landed cost, 15.5 cents; the retail price, 50 cents; the percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 346 per cent; and the percentage of retail price to landed cost, 221 per cent; and the receipt accompanies it. It was bought of Louis K. Liggett, of New York, on the 6th day of June.

The next article is a string of amber beads [exhibiting], which was produced in Germany. The foreign cost was 62 cents; the landed cost, 76 cents; the retail price, $12.50; the spread between the foreign cost and the retail price, 1,916 per cent; the spread between the landed cost and the retail price, 1,544 per cent. It was bought of Gimbel Bros. in New York, and the receipt accompanies the exhibit.

Mr. President, on the 8th of May of last month there appeared in the New York Times this advertisement:

DO YOU WANT TO PAY MORE FOR YOUR LINENS?

JAMES MCCUTCHEON & CO.,
Fifth Avenue, Thirty-fourth, and Thirty-fifth Streets,
New York.

I want to call the attention of those who honor me with their presence to this advertisement and to the situation which it unfolds—

To the public:

The Senate committee has reported to the Senate the new tariff bill. This bill would raise the duties on linen from 30 and 40 per cent to 50 and 60 per cent; or, in other words, would almost double them. This will, of course, mean that the prices of these goods will have to be advanced.

By way of illustration—

And I call particular attention to this—

By way of illustration, a towel—

I have here [exhibiting] the very towel to which reference is made—a towel 18 by 32 inches, which now sells at $6 per dozen, would have to sell at $7.25 or $7.50 a dozen—

It is safe to say that if these men were selling it it would sell for $7.50—under the new tariff. Handkerchiefs which to-day are selling around $3.85 a dozen would have to sell for about $4.50 a dozen.

I want to call attention to that statement specifically in just a moment, but I desire first to read the remainder of the advertisement:

If this change was going to protect the American workingman and American manufacturer, we would have nothing to say. But it does not, for the simple reason that, except for the lower-end huck towels and crashes there is practically no linen manufactured in the United States. More than 98 per cent of the linen you use comes from abroad.

Now, listen to this, and if you have tears to shed prepare to shed them now—

We have been making very strenuous efforts in the last year and a half to reduce the prices of all of our goods and are most distressed at the thought of having to advance them at a time like this. If you agree with us that such a change in the tariff rate on linens is unwise and that the prices should not be forced up, won't you write to your Senator and Representative in Congress and protest against this uncalled-for advance in rates?

Yours very truly,

JAMES MCCUTCHEON & CO.,

On the front page in the first column of the New York Evening Post of the isue of June 20 occurs an article headed:

Tariff on linen will only make prices higher. Will not "protect," as nearly all finished product is imported. By William E. Speers, treasurer, James McCutcheon & Co.

The article which follows sets forth precisely the same language that is employed in the advertisement which I have just read. I quote from the article as follows:

The Senate committee has reported to the Senate a new tariff bill, and this bill is now under discussion. In common with almost all the schedules, the rates of the linen schedule of the tariff have been quite sharply increased. Where formerly a linen towel paid 35 per cent duty, it will have to pay 50 or 60 per cent, and the same is true of damask tablecloths and napkins. A plain hemmed or hemstitched linen handkerchief which formerly paid 40 per cent duty will, under the new tariff, pay 60 per cent.

These changes will, of course, inevitably raise the landed cost of the article in question, and consequently increase the selling price which the wholesalers and retailers must receive in order to cover expenses and legitimate profit.

By way of illustration, a plain huck face towel—

The same towel I have here [exhibiting]—

18 by 32 inches, which at present sells in New York for $6 per dozen, would have to sell for $7.25 or $7.50 per dozen under the new tariff. There would be a proportionate advance in the price of table napkins and tablecloths.

A proportionate advance, mark you.

If we take the case of handkerchiefs, we find that a dozen handkerchiefs which to-day are being sold at retail for $3.85 per dozen would have to be advanced to at least $4.50 per dozen, if the new rates in the tariff schedule went into effect.

One of the worst features of this schedule from the standpoint of the consuming public is that the coarser, cheaper fabrics, such as linings for overcoats, cheap towels, and cheap napkins, all are made to pay a duty of 60 per cent, whereas the more expensive, finer articles pay only 50 per cent.

I want now briefly to devote a little attention to that argument. What is it?

The merchandise referred to in this advertisement consists of this towel and of the handkerchief. On hemstiched towels and handkerchiefs—get the phrase—the present rate is 35 per cent on towels and 40 per cent on handkerchiefs. The proposed rate is 60 per cent on towels and handkerchiefs—an increase of 50 per cent on one and of practically 70 per cent on the other. An investigation—and anybody can make the investigation—will disclose these facts. What are they?

In the case of the towels, on which the present rate of duty is 35 per cent, the foreign cost—this is the investigation and the result of it, just like these others were investigated—the foreign cost converted is $2.76 a dozen; landing charges, 9.6 cents; duty, 35 per cent, or 96.6 cents. In other words, the landed cost under the present tariff is $3.82 a dozen. I pause here long enough to say that the selling price at this time, according to their own advertisement, is $6, so that they get at the present time 80 per cent of an increase; but that is not what I want to stress.

I call your attention to the fact that under our proposed rate they will pay the same in the foreign country as they do now, $2.76. The landing charges will be precisely the same, 9.6 cents. Only the duty would be increased from 35 to 60 per cent, and that increase in duty would be the difference between 96 cents and $1.65, or 70 cents. In other words, the landed cost of the towel at the present time is $3.82 a dozen, and under the proposed bill it would be $4.51 per dozen, or an increase of 70 cents; and yet they squarely assert in this advertisement that if this new tariff is put on they will be compelled to increase the price $1.50 a dozen. There is no increase in the foreign cost, and there is no increase in the landed cost, and the only increase is in the duty, and the increase in the duty is only 70 cents, and yet in this advertisement they squarely say to their people that it will become necessary for them to increase the price of this towel $1.50 a dozen.

So much for the towel.

At the present time the rate on the handkerchief is 40 per cent. In other words, a dozen abroad cost $1.76; the landing charges are 8.8 cents; the duty is 40 per cent, amounting to 70.4 cents. The landed cost is $2.55 under the existing law. They sell the handkerchiefs at $3.85 a dozen, according to this advertisement, which is about 70 per cent increase now; but the rate would be increased to 60 per cent by our bill. The foreign cost will be the same, $1.76; the landing charge is the same, 8.8 cents; and the duty would be increased how much? The duty would be increased but 35 cents. That is to say, the only difference in the landed cost of a dozen of the handkerchiefs would be the difference between $2.55 now and $2.90, or 35 cents; and yet they squarely assert in this advertisement which I have read to you that it will be necessary for them to increase the price of the handkerchiefs from $3.85 to $4.50, or 65 cents a dozen. So that, according to their own advertisement, they would take advantage of this duty to charge a far greater price than the circumstances warrant or the conditions permit. They are direct importers—J. McCutcheon & Co.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that they are the largest importers in America. In fact, they virtually control the linen market of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator advise us whether comparable articles are made in this country?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They are; yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are sold in competition with the American product?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Why, certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And what the Senator is complaining of is that they do not reduce the price so as to destroy the American production?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My contention is that, without a protective duty, they would destroy the American production. There is not any doubt in the world about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. By charging a high price?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does anybody pretend to say that if we do not put on a protective duty these imports will destroy the American production?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. These outrageous profits which McCutcheon is making by charging high prices tend to injure American industry, do they?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Ah! That is not the point at all. I wonder how often I will have to say that thing over and over again to get my friend to understand it. I am not going to say it over any more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator want McCutcheon to reduce those prices so as to wipe out the American production?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; that is not the point I have made at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to answer the question in this way: That if McCutcheon and these other importers will not reduce their prices, we want some of the profit they are making to go into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The point of the whole business is simply this: It would simply take away a part of these enormous profits. Listen to me: If under the pending bill McCutcheon & Co. were willing to make from 30 to 33⅓ per cent—and I have the exact figures here—they would not need to raise the price; they could sell that handkerchief and that towel at precisely the same price and yet make between 30 and 33⅓ per cent. That they do not want to do; and their advertisement, in order to arouse the American people, and especially to excite the women, who are their purchasers, shows that they want to take an unfair advantage of this duty in order to convince the people that they are about to be robbed, when it is McCutcheon & Co. that are doing the robbing, and not the tariff.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I admit that if the Senator's figures are correct; but I should like to ask the Senator this question: What becomes of the argument which he has made here so frequently and so eloquently that under the present tariff act these foreign imports of goods made by pauper labor are flooding the country and tending to destroy American industry?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can not go into that. That means a whole tariff speech. My friend gets up and asks me to make a whole tariff speech here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the Senator's present speech answering the other speeches he has made here?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No, no.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me go on and finish this, and then I will listen to my friend.

What is the real fact about the whole business? The real fact is that on the great body of linens imported into this country we raise the duty only from 50 to 60 per cent. Here are two hemstitched towels. Anybody can look at these who cares to. They were made in Ireland. The foreign cost was $14.48 a dozen. The landed cost, including the duty, was $19.90 a dozen. The retail price was $65 a dozen. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 349 per cent. The percentage of retail price to landed cost was 227 per cent. These were bought of whom? James McCutcheon & Co. There is the receipt for the money, the $65, taken across their counter, and yet listen to this camouflage that they throw about this:

We have been making strenuous efforts in the last year and a half to reduce the prices of all of our goods and are most distressed at the thought of having to advance them at a time like this.

And they take this tariff that we propose to put on the towels and on the handkerchiefs as a basis for the whole argument on the linen question, but they fail to mention the other linens in any advertisement that they have ever put out to the American people. They do not say anything about these fine tablecloths. They do not say anything about these superior qualities of linen. They do not say anything about the damasks—not at all. They mention only the towels and the handkerchiefs, and on those they propose, according to their own advertisement, to increase the price outrageously without justification and without warrant.

Here are some more towels. So far as I know and the figures show, they are of a cheaper quality. The foreign cost was $3.52 a dozen. The landed cost was $4.87 a dozen. The retail price was $24 a dozen. The percentage of retail price to foreign cost was 582 per cent. The percentage of retail price to landed cost was 393 per cent. They were bought of whom? James McCutcheon & Co., New York, and there is the receipt for the money paid when the article was bought of the men who say:

We have been making strenuous efforts in the last year and a half to reduce the prices of all of our goods, and are most distressed at the thought of having to advance them at a time like this.

Put out as an advertisement—what for? For the purpose of arousing the American public against this bill, when they themselves in their own language admit that they intend to take an unfair advantage of these rates to boost the price and cheat their customers.

What is the next?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; not until I get through this.

Mr. STANLEY. Just one suggestion; I think I catch the point of the Senator. The whole question has resolved itself into who shall do the profiteering.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; not at all. I do not agree with the Senator at all on that proposition. I deny that the American manufacturer in the main is a profiteer, and I deny that the American wholesaler in the main is a profiteer, and I deny that the American retailer in the main is a profiteer. Why is it that whenever we have a tariff question or any other question up, our friends on the other side inveigh against business and criticize business men? We are always led to believe that any man who is in business is a thief; that any man who tries to carry on an industry in the United States is a scoundrel; that there is something wrong with his heart and something perverted about his soul. Those things I absolutely deny. These business men have made possible the prosperity of this country. They have been the leaders along business lines. They have not only furnished the capital to develop our industries and to utilize our natural resources, but they have employed labor. They have taken that labor into their confidence from time to time, until to-day the laboring people in the United States, under a Republican policy always, have come to be the best-paid and the best-fed and the best-found and the best-clothed and the best-educated laboring men, and the most moral, with more of comfort in their American homes and more of hope in their American hearts than any laboring men who ever used their hands in toil on earth before.

Yet you are always undertaking to make us believe that the men who have accomplished these miracles of commerce and industry are no better than cormorants who prey and fatten upon the labors of the people. I deny it all, and I say that these men are absolutely essential to the industry and the independence of the American people.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the Senator's remark about McCutcheon did not indicate any special interest in big business.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. He is not a manufacturer; he is an importer.

Mr. STANLEY. The only difference between the Senator and myself is this, I believe that a profiteer ought to go to the penitentiary if we can get our claws on him, whether he sells linen or anything else, whether he manufactures it or imports it, whether he subsidizes my party or fights it. The Senator confines his animadversions to the profiteer who happens to criticize this tariff, and does not notice the profiteer who is devouring the consumer and battening upon the necessities of the American people.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have heard that ever since I was a boy——

Mr. STANLEY. You do not seem to heed it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Ever since I was a child, the same old thing. I recited it here the other day ad libitum to my friends on the other side. It is the same old argument; but it is not really an argument. It is that peculiar frame of mind into which my Democratic friends get themselves at times. I remember hearing the late Thomas B. Reed say on the floor of the House one day that he had often stood out in front of one of the great industrial establishments of the country, and thought of his own comparative poverty, and of the great wealth that was being displayed on the inside in the vast machinery, the marvelous buildings, and the tremendous establishment, and that he had often wondered why it was that the virtue out on the sidewalk had not been rewarded equally with the virtue inside of that building. "But," he said, "when I came to myself and considered the situation I knew that it was real, old-fashioned, downright envy; just envy, that is all." "But," he said, with his nasal twang, "When a Democrat gets that kind of a feeling he thinks it is political economy." There is a great deal of truth in that. Our friends are against the whole system, and if they had had their way we would not have this system in the United States to-day, because these industries have been built up and this labor has been employed, and they have been brought to their high condition among the peoples of the world, and our industries have been developed and our resources diversified, through the operation of the protective tariff, and history attests the truthfulness of that statement.

I come down now to tablecloths. Under a Republican policy we always have something, thank fortune, to put on the tablecloth. I have here a tablecloth made in Scotland. The foreign cost is $9.05. Let our friends come over and look at it. The landed cost, including the duty, was $12.67. The retail price was $22. The percentage of the retail price to the foreign cost was 143 per cent. The percentage of the retail price to landed cost was 73 per cent. Then there are the napkins to match. What are they? Country of manufacture, Scotland. Hemstitched. Foreign cost, $13.27 a dozen. Landed cost, including the duty, $18.57. Retail price, $32. Percentage of retail price to foreign cost, 141 per cent. Percentage of retail price to landed cost, 65 per cent. How modest they are to make but 65 per cent on this. Here is the bill, and here is the receipt. So much for all that.

So these prices were charged by the man who, in his advertisement, said, "We are most distressed at the thought of having to advance these prices at a time like this." And under his own statement he advances them far more than the figures justify and the facts warrant.

I think that if facts can prove anything, or figures can demonstrate any proposition, I have shown beyond the peradventure of a doubt to any man who wants to know, first, with respect to the cost of production abroad, that its very cheapness is something with which we can not compete, and in the absence of a protective tariff American industry would be undermined and destroyed. That is my contention. You have to have protection, and you can not build up industry in any other way.

In the second place, I have shown the enormous profits these importing houses are making on these things. That is why they send out these petitions to their retailers. That is why they are putting all these advertisements in the newspapers. Will the great New York Times, one of the ablest and strongest papers published and edited in all the world, publish the truth about these things? No; it will not. Why? Because James McCutcheon & Co. will not permit them to do it. That is precisely the reason.

Only recently, on June 13, this very month, the American Fabrics Co., of Bridgeport, Conn., lace manufacturers, offered an advertisement to the New York Times through the E. H. Clarke Advertising Agency, quoting wholesale prices of lace offered for sale. The advertising agency submitted the "ad" to the Times, but that newspaper declined to publish it.

On June 13 the advertising agency wrote the American Fabrics Co. as follows:

> Representatives of the Times explained to us that prices may be given in only two ways: Either the advertisement should quote the lowest and the highest figures at which the goods are offered wholesale, or else it should quote the price at which the goods are to sell at retail. The reason given for this is that retailers object to the quoting of a set wholesale price on the ground that it injures their business.

I quote that only for the purpose of showing the strangle hold the retail and importing establishments of New York have on some of these very great publications and newspapers.

I have as great admiration for the New York Times as a newspaper as anybody else, but it is an international paper. It believes in these importing houses. It is opposed fundamentally to the establishment of American industry, if and where such industry interferes with the importing business, and those are the same people who all the time tried to drag us into the League of Nations and into all these other foreign embroilments, and that is the thing to which I object. I do not want an isolated country, and it is all folly to talk about ours being such a country, with all the relations we have with all the other peoples of the world; but I want a thoroughly Americanized country, and I want our labor developed as it has been, on an American plane, living an American life, holding to American ideals, and all these things, my friends, testify to the fact that these great results, which have made us at once the wonder and the envy of the world, can be worked out only through a beneficent protective-tariff policy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McCormick	Pomerene
Cameron	Harreld	McCumber	Sheppard
Capper	Harris	McKellar	Simmons
Caraway	Heflin	McKinley	Smith
Culberson	Hitchcock	McLean	Smoot
Cummins	Johnson	McNary	Spencer
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Stanley
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sterling
Dillingham	Kellogg	Nicholson	Swanson
du Pont	Keyes	Norbeck	Townsend
Edge	King	Oddie	Trammell
Ernst	Ladd	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	La Follette	Owen	Watson, Ga.
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Phipps	Williams
Gooding	Lodge	Poindexter	Willis

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield to me to call up a resolution?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield if it does not lead to any discussion.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 308, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 308), submitted by him yesterday, as follows:

Whereas it has been charged upon the floor of the Senate that each and every one of the regional Federal reserve banks of the United States has had printed and distributed at its own expense a speech delivered in the Senate by Senator GLASS, of Virginia, in which the position of Senator HEFLIN on the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board was assailed and criticized: Therefore be it

Resolved, That all of said Federal reserve banks, except the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, which has already reported to the Senate, be, and they are hereby, requested, respectively, to furnish to the Senate in writing a list of the names and addresses of citizens to whom said speech was sent, and all information in their possession, respectively, called for in the following questions:

1. At whose instance was the speech in question of Senator GLASS sent out?
2. At whose expense was said speech printed and distributed?
3. How was the fund provided and how many copies of said speech were sent out and how much money was expended in printing and distributing said speech?
4. Did any member of the Federal Reserve Board suggest the printing or distribution of the said speech?
5. Was any letter sent out with said speech? If so, attach a copy to your report.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. It is a resolution I called up last night, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] asked that it go over until this morning. I called it up a little while ago, when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was here and made no objection, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected temporarily. I now ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. MCLEAN. I think the resolution ought to go to the committee. I do not know that there is any serious objection to it, but its ramifications are pretty wide, and what it involves I do not know. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina yielded to me, and I do not want to take up any of his time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield the floor to the Senator if he will permit me just a moment. I had intended to discuss some of the observations made by my good friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], but I think as this is the lunch hour I shall wait until a little later, perhaps half-past 2 or 3 o'clock, before I proceed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in January of this year the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] made a speech of several hours' length, and my name was mentioned several times in that speech. Speeches that I had made on the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board were attempted to be replied to, and the Senator undertook to refute a number of my statements. That speech has been put in pamphlet form. Thousands of copies of it have been circulated by the Federal reserve banks of the United States. These banking institutions are governmental institutions provided for under the law of Congress, and their officers are quasi public officials, all of them. They are taking up the speech of one Senator, criticizing and assailing the position of another Senator, and partly at Government expense and the expense of the banks they are having that speech printed and widely circulated in the United States.

Some time ago I offered a resolution to have the political activities of the bank at Atlanta investigated, a bank which supplies money to the banks of my State. As I have stated, that bank had this speech printed and sent to the banks and business men of my State. I as a Senator from that State had criticized the policy of deflation and had criticized and excoriated as best I could the Federal Reserve Board for that crime against the country. This speech was sent into my State, and a letter written with it asking the reader to give his opinion upon the subject, as to how he felt upon it before he read the Glass speech and how he felt upon it after he had read the Glass speech. There never was a more brazen attempt to injure a man politically, to use the power of a governmental institution to intimidate and hurt a United States Senator, made by anybody or any institution.

I offered the resolution, and I objected to the resolution going to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. I said that it would never be reported, and it has not been reported from that good day to this. No action has ever been had upon it, and in order to get the information that I sought I offered another resolution that would save the Government expense by calling on the bank at Atlanta to give in writing the information that I wanted, to wit: To whom did they send the speech? If they wrote a letter, to send a copy of the letter. At whose expense did they publish and distribute the speech? How many did they distribute and at what cost? They gave that information to me. I am now asking that the other regional banks do the same thing. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is always on guard, always to the rescue when any Senator undertakes to have justice done to the masses of the people who are entitled to have this money institution properly governed, now moves to refer my resolution of to-day to the death chamber of his committee, where my other resolution lies buried.

Mr. MCLEAN. My recollection is that some committee was appointed to consider the resolution to which the Senator refers. I do not know whether the Senator has requested any hearings or has taken any steps to get a report or not. My recollection is that in the absence of any report from the committee, the information desired by the Senator has been sent to the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. By the Atlanta bank?

Mr. MCLEAN. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Without expense to the Government, without costing the Government one cent. Under the first resolution it might have cost a few dollars to have them come up here, if ever you reported the resolution, so I decided to do it the other way and to get around the committee, to which I never wanted my resolution sent in the first place.

Mr. MCLEAN. It does not seem to me the Senator has any cause for complaint if he has the information on his previous resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. From the one bank.

Mr. MCLEAN. Very likely he can get it in so far as this resolution is concerned. All I ask is that the proceedings be regular. It is unusual to ask action on a resolution of this sort by unanimous consent. It involves a good deal——

Mr. HEFLIN. I know it does.

Mr. MCLEAN. It may involve a good deal of expense.

Mr. HEFLIN. I realize that it is a difficult matter to get unanimous consent wherever the Money Trust is involved.

Mr. MCLEAN. I will assure the Senator that if the resolution goes to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I shall appoint a subcommittee to consider it. I do not know that there is any objection to the resolution, but I do object to this multiplication of resolutions on the part of the Senator from Alabama and insisting that they be passed by the Senate when no one is here. I shall insist on my motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to be heard on the Senator's motion at length. I propose to have the country know each day and all the time while I am here just what transpires and some of the situation about the motives back of the thing. This is a Government of the people. What I ask is a matter of simple justice to myself. I am involved, assailed by a speech full of inaccurate statements and incorrect figures.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I deny absolutely that there is a single inaccuracy in the speech to which the Senator refers. I am getting very tired of these utterly false accusations by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator charges me with making a false statement, he is a liar.

Mr. GLASS. I charge him with it; I charge that he is repeatedly making false statements.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I call both Senators to order.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator's blackguardism does not help him any.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call both Senators to order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not permit the Senator to insult me.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call both Senators to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama insulted the Senator from Virginia, and the Senator from Virginia in reciprocity, I suppose, insulted the Senator from Alabama, but in neither of those things has the Senate as a body in the slightest degree any part or parcel. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] calls both Senators to order. He is absolutely within his rights when he does that. I insist that the call to order by the Senator from Georgia shall be immediately obeyed in the words of the rule of the Senate in order that we may not turn this body into a fighting body. We have hitherto been noncombative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist that the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia is well made and ought to be obeyed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask that the rule be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Rule XIX of the Senate, beginning with paragraph 2, reads as follows:

2. No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

3. No Senator in debate shall refer offensively to any State of the Union.

4. If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be called to order he shall sit down, and not proceed without leave of the Senate, which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed in order, which motion shall be determined without debate.

5. If a Senator be called to order for words spoken in debate, upon the demand of the Senator or of any other Senator the objectionable words shall be taken down in writing, and read at the table for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I insist upon the observance of the rule.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Senator from Alabama be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall insist upon the observance of the rule.

Mr. EDGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McCumber	Sheppard
Broussard	Harreld	McKellar	Shortridge
Bursum	Harris	McKinley	Smith
Cameron	Harrison	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Heflin	Moses	Spencer
Caraway	Hitchcock	Nelson	Townsend
Curtis	Johnson	Newberry	Trammell
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Wadsworth
du Pont	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kellogg	Oddie	Warren
Ernst	Ladd	Overman	Watson, Ga.
France	La Follette	Pepper	Watson, Ind.
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Poindexter	Williams
Glass	Lodge	Pomerene	Willis
Gooding	McCormick	Rawson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names; a quorum is present. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] be allowed to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to withdraw the language that I used a little while ago. This is not the place to use language of that kind. I used the expression that the speech of the Senator from Virginia was full of inaccurate and incorrect statements. I do not think that would call for a statement from him such as did come from him. I was provoked that he did use that language, and I desire to withdraw what I said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the Senator could have used the expression "inaccurate and incorrect statements," and that would have been all right, but I think he said "inaccurate and false statements." He ought to withdraw the word "false."

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think that I used the word "false" until after the Senator from Virginia had said what he did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator used that word, and that was the offense.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Virginia is willing to withdraw his language as to my statements being "false," or regarding a "false position," I am willing for that to go out also.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am always willing to withdraw any unparliamentary language that I may use on the floor of the Senate and to regret having been provoked to use any unparliamentary language. The Senator from Alabama or any other Senator is perfectly at liberty to say a speech which I make contains inaccuracies; that may be said without offense; but when the Senator repeatedly states that my speech contains misrepresentations and false statements, that is a very different proposition. When the Senator shall have withdrawn that statement I shall very gladly withdraw my retort.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did not use the language that the speech of the Senator from Virginia was full of misrepresentations, as I recall, but I said that it contained inaccurate and incorrect statements.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask that the reporter's notes may be read in order that we may know exactly what is the issue in controversy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notes of the reporter will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read from the transcript of the reporter's notes as follows:

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to be heard on the Senator's motion at length. I propose to have the country know each day and all the time while I am here just what transpires and some of the situations about the motives back of the thing. This is a Government of the people. What I ask is simply a courtesy to myself. I am involved, assailed by a speech full of inaccurate statements and inaccurate material.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I deny absolutely that there is a single inaccuracy in the speech to which the Senator refers. I am getting very tired of these utterly false accusations by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator charges me with making a false statement he is a liar.

Mr. GLASS. I charge him with it; I charge that he is repeatedly making false statements.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I call both Senators to order.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator's blackguardism does not help him any.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call both Senators to order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not permit the Senator to insult me.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call both Senators to order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the notes show that I never used the words "false representations" or "misrepresentations." I said "inaccurate statements," "incorrect statements," but according to the notes I never used any offensive language until the Senator from Virginia said what he did.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it is perfectly evident that I was mistaken in my supposition that the Senator accused me of misrepresentation. He seems to have accused me of inaccuracy, which, of course, I deny, but it is not offensive to a Senator to say that he is inaccurate in a statement. Therefore I very greatly deplore that I was betrayed into a characterization such as I made, and, of course, I am willing to withdraw it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. President, I was going on to say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] that when my resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency I thought it should not go there, in the first place, because there was a controversy involving myself and a member of that committee, namely, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; I thought the open Senate ought to act upon it, and I made that request; but, nevertheless, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency by a margin of two votes, as I recall. It does not make any difference whether the speech was made by the Senator from Virginia, myself, or any other Senator, but whenever a Senator is sharply taken to task and his position ridiculed and criticized, and the statements that he makes are undertaken to be refuted, then a banking institution under control of the Government and operating under law has got no right to go into politics and circulate that speech at the expense of the bank's funds, some of which would go to the Government if they were not used for that purpose. That is the position that I take.

This speech was circulated in my State, and circulated amongst bankers, I repeat, who have got to go to the Federal Reserve Bank in Atlanta to get money, and a letter was written to them asking, "What was your opinion on this subject before you read the speech of the Senator from Virginia, and what is your opinion of it now?" I was the Senator assailed—named and assailed—in that speech. That speech was being circulated in my State, and the letter was being written to people whom I represent in this body and to whom I am responsible.

I asked the Senate to let us investigate that bank down there, and the Senator from Connecticut opposed that course, and this resolution was referred to his committee, where it has been asleep for weeks and months. In my judgment, it never will be reported. I went to the subcommittee. I spoke to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] time and time again, and he said: "I have been trying to get a meeting of the committee," and again he said, "I have been trying to get a meeting of the subcommittee." I took the Glass speech and marked the parts of it that I thought reflected upon me and that took to task things that I had asserted as facts obtained from the bulletins of the Federal Reserve Board itself, from which I got much of my information, and I said, "These are the objectionable things"; and I turned that over, pointed out and marked, to the subcommittee, and no report has ever been made.

Then I introduced a resolution calling on the bank at Atlanta to give the mailing list, the people to whom it sent that speech, the number that it sent out, and the cost incurred in sending it out. I found that they circulated 6,500 copies of that speech. The original print cost twenty-odd dollars a thousand, and each additional thousand cost $15. It cost something to address them and send them out, so there is considerable expense incurred in it. That was done, that bank reported under my resolution passed by the Senate, without a cent of cost to the Government.

Then I offered this resolution calling upon each and every one of the other Federal reserve banks, 11 of them, operating under the law, Government institutions, and the Senator from Connecticut objects to the immediate consideration of it and wants it referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I, a Senator in this body, am assailed in that speech. My position is criticized. I do not object to that if people who read that speech can read mine also. I am willing for each one of them to pass judgment upon the case, as thousands have, and have written to me their judgment, as doubtless some of them have to the Senator from Virginia. There are two sides to it. I want the same people who got his speech to get my speech; and as a Senator in this body I ask other Senators, after telling them the situation, to pass this resolution and to give me this information and let this body have that information, and the Senator from Connecticut persists in sending it to his committee, where I do not think it will ever be acted on.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. It seems that the bank to which the Senator wrote for information responded, and he got all the data that he wanted. Why does not the Senator write to the other banks?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not write to them. I got that other information by a resolution passed through this body calling on them to give it, and the Federal Reserve Board requested them, as was its duty, to comply with the Senate resolution, and this resolution is asking the other banks to do what that bank did.

Why does the Senator object to it? How can he object to it? Mr. President, there is not a Senator on the other side who could rise in the circumstances that I am in, where his position had been assailed and speeches sent into his State and over the country refuting his stand and his statements, to whose request I would object. I would help him to get unanimous consent; but here stands the Senator from Connecticut, blocking this unanimous consent that I requested, and instead of giving me action on it to-day, that I may get these lists and send my speech to them if I desire, he wants to send the resolution to his committee. I want the people of the country to see and judge for themselves just how fair they think the Senator from Connecticut is in this matter.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Connecticut is not worrying about that. As I have already said, I do not know that there is any objection to the Senator's resolution; but these resolutions are coming rather frequently, and I remember one of them, introduced some time ago, which called for data with regard to the construction expenses of the Federal reserve bank and it cost several thousand dollars to get that information and collect it. It has been in the office of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency for some time, and I do not know that the Senator from Alabama has even looked at it.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is that—about the bank in New York?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have all of that information in my office. I had them send it over. There is a wheelbarrow full of it, and I have been going over it.

Mr. McLEAN. My impression is that if the Senator from Alabama will write to these banks, he will get all the information he wants. It seems to me to be forcing matters somewhat to call upon the Senate of the United States—I do not know what special jurisdiction they have over the subject—to deal with this matter by a Senate resolution; and I wish the Senator would try to get his information without putting the Government to any expense in the matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. There will not be any expense in this matter at all. It will not cost the Government a cent.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator now that if he will write to these banks and they do not respond, and respond immediately, I shall have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have pursued the course that I think is wise and just. The Senate has already called on this bank at Atlanta and it has responded. Now the Senator wants me to write to these banks who have been circulating a speech that assails my position and ask them to do me a favor. Congress created these banks. It created the board; and the Federal Reserve Bank at Atlanta said, in response to the question as to who suggested that they send out the Glass speech, that the Federal Reserve Board advised them that it was available. Of course the board suggested it. These banks were created by Congress. They are operating under the law enacted by Congress. Why can not the Senate, in response to the request of a Senator, call on that bank, call on each and every one of those banks, to furnish certain information to it when they have circulated a speech, it makes no difference whose it is, that bitterly assails the position of another Senator, a Member of the country's lawmaking body.

I am utterly astounded that any Senator should object. Would I object if a speech of mine criticizing the position of any other Senator was being sent out in his State and in other States by a banking institution, and he should want the names of those to whom it was sent in order to send his, so that he could answer mine? Would I oppose it? Why, no; I would not oppose it. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has not openly opposed it. I have heard nothing said from him upon the floor in opposition to this resolution.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that I would never think of introducing in the Senate of the United States a resolution instructing the banks of the country to furnish information that was personal to me until I had first requested them to send me that information; and I want to say to the Senator now that if he will write these banks and they decline to furnish this information, I shall be glad to support his resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator, then, puts himself in the attitude, in his place as a Senator in this body, that unless I will pursue his suggestion and request these banks to do me the favor of giving me the information that I desire, he will vote against allowing the Senate to request those banks to give me this information. I take that to be the attitude of the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; I think it is entirely unnecessary action on the part of the Senate of the United States. I think if the Senator will write these banks he will get all the information he wants, and I think it is up to him to attempt to get it in that way before he calls upon the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I offered a resolution regarding the Atlanta bank, and the papers were full of it, stating that I wanted that information, and showing what the resolution called for, and they saw copies of the resolution, and they never responded. They did not respond at all. Some of the newspapers said that my resolution never would be reported, and they told the truth about it. Then, when I offered the other resolution, nobody objected to it.

I did not believe that anybody would object to this one; but the Senator from Connecticut strenuously objects to it. Here is this great banking system, operating under the law, circulating one Senator's speech assailing another Senator's speech and position, and the Senator from Connecticut does not want the Senator assailed to have a list of those to whom the speech was sent, so that he can have an opportunity to send them his speech if he desires, or otherwise to communicate with those people; and after the Senate has set the precedent, has already done this with regard to the Atlanta bank, the Senator from Connecticut now wants to hold up action on my resolution regarding the other 11 regional banks in the United States.

Mr. President, I can not understand it. I regret to see the Senator from Connecticut take this stand, but it so happens that when any measure comes in here that looks toward regulating in any way those who control the money supply of the country, those in charge of these institutions, and requiring the Federal Reserve Board to observe the law or to bring down interest rates, the Senator from Connecticut is always on the spot and he comes enthusiastically to the rescue.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is entirely mistaken. Since I have been in the Senate I have never voted against a resolution of investigation of any kind—not once.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator voted to refer my resolution to his committee.

Mr. McLEAN. And I tried to make it clear to the Senator that I might vote for this resolution, but I think it ought to go to the committee; and I will assure the Senator that it will be reported right out. If the subcommittee to which the other resolution was referred have not reported, I am surprised. I had assumed that they had reported on that resolution; but I think it is the duty of Senators who want information that is personal to try to get it in the ordinary way before they come in here and ask for the passage of a resolution by the Senate. The motive of the Senator is immaterial to me.

I have no doubt that it is a good one, and I am always glad to listen to him when he attacks the banks, because if the banks deserve punishment I want them to get it. I do not believe in attacking the banks unless they deserve it; and it is for that reason that I think this resolution, like other resolutions, should go to the committee in the orderly way.

I will say to the Senator that I shall continue to object to the consideration of this resolution, and I shall insist on my motion that it go to the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I never criticize a bank unless I think that bank is doing wrong. I criticized the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board because I believe it is a burning shame and a crime against the country. I have a right to criticize it; and I have condemned the conduct of these banks which have circulated one Senator's speech against another Senator without giving him the opportunity to send his. I do not ask any favors of them. I want the Congress which created them to let them know that we have a scrutinizing eye on them always, and that they can not meddle in politics and circulate one Senator's speech against the position of another Senator in order to sustain their position. Why should I be put in the attitude of writing to these banks which have taken that stand against me simply because I dared to stand in my place and criticize the policy of deflation?

The feeling that these officers have exhibited in circulating the speech shows that they were trying to answer my position and injure me politically if they could. I think that is clearly established in the minds of all fair-minded people.

The Senator from Connecticut voted against the consideration of my resolution to investigate a Federal reserve bank close to my State, which was circulating this speech in my State amongst the people I represent in part in this body. The Senator had his way then, and he would not permit the Senate to act upon that resolution, though the situation involved me personally. The resolution went to the Senator's committee, and there it has remained ever since, and he is now asking me to send this resolution to the same committee. Mr. President, I repeat I do not want it to go to that committee.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator is again mistaken. I was not present when the vote was taken on that resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, did the Senator favor it going to his committee?

Mr. McLEAN. That is another matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; that is another matter.

Mr. McLEAN. I wish the Senator would try to be accurate in his aspersions.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the Senator now if he did not approve the course which sent it to the committee?

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator said I voted for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought the Senator was here and voted for it.

Mr. McLEAN. My recollection is that I was not present.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the Senator now if he did not approve the course which sent it to his committee?

Mr. McLEAN. Very likely if I had been here I should have voted to send it to the committee, because I believe that should be done with all such resolutions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if any Senator on the other side were involved as I was involved and am involved and should make a request for unanimous consent such as I made I would favor it and help him to get it through, but an effort is made to keep me from getting information regarding my own State and myself, a Senator in this body, fighting in his place for what he believes is right, as I have a right to do. What is it back of this spirited move to block action on my resolution? The Senator from Connecticut may satisfy his own conscience; that may not be hard to do——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I withdraw my motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McLEAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his motion, but objects to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thought the Senator would object. I like to have the truth of a situation come out. I want the exact position of men in this body on public questions to be known. The people have a right to know, and I have a right to express my opinion about the situation which it involves.

This is the simple proposition: The Federal reserve system, a great banking institution, which I helped to establish, the greatest banking institution in all the world, has never been criticized by me in one word. I have condemned the maladministration of the system. I have condemned the Federal Reserve Board. There was a speech circulated which assailed and criticized my position, and I asked that the list of those to whom it was sent be sent to the Senate, in order that I might have the names, and send my speech to those people, in order that they might read both sides and decide for themselves, in this free Republic of the west. I thought that was a simple request and a fair one. I did not believe that anybody would oppose it.

I wanted to know, and I wanted the Senate to know and the public to know, who suggested the sending out of the speech of the Senator from Virginia, how much it cost, who paid for it, and to whom it was sent. Anything wrong about that?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. SHEPPARD. How many times can a resolution go over on objection? Did not this resolution go over yesterday on objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It did.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has not the Senator now a right to move that it be taken up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I make the point of order that it can not be before the Senate. We are in the same legislative day, and under the rules of the Senate that resolution can not come before the Senate except by unanimous consent until we have had an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama rose and asked unanimous consent, which was granted; the resolution has been read and a motion has been made against it. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. The motion to refer has been withdrawn and objection was made to immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was made, and it could not have been made unless the resolution was before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. It could be made by unanimous consent. The resolution was not before the Senate. The record will show, I am sure, that unanimous consent was not given for immediate consideration of the resolution, but, in fact, it was objected to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I inquire what becomes of the unfinished business if this resolution is now before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. It would displace the tariff bill as the unfinished business.

Mr. LENROOT. Unanimous consent has been objected to, so it could not be before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no objection made at the time the resolution was read. A motion was made on it, and the resolution has been read.

Mr. LENROOT. But the motion has been withdrawn. It was a motion to refer. When the motion was withdrawn that left the resolution exactly where it was before any request had been made concerning it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How could the motion have been made unless the resolution were before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. The only way the resolution could be before the Senate would be by unanimous consent or on a motion to take it up. The Chair says there was no objection. Perhaps there was no objection at the time—I can not say, because I was not in the Chamber—but the motion to refer it has been withdrawn and there is no unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Objection was made by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Chair's ruling is correct, then the unfinished business will be displaced. No vote was taken, and some Senator certainly would have objected to the tariff bill being displaced. Not only that, but when a resolution is presented and a request is made for its immediate consideration anyone in the Senate has a perfect right to object at any time before the resolution is passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that instead of an objection being made a motion was made to refer the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the objection was renewed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the record.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the Senator is of the opinion that that prevents immediate consideration of it?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was speaking on the subject covered by the resolution, as he has a right to do, but with the tariff bill before the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. It may be that the resolution is temporarily withdrawn; but I am still before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not object to that. I said the Senator has that right, and I am not objecting to it at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But has the Senator a right to renew the objection after a motion has been made to refer the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, at any time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. An opportunity was offered for objection when the resolution was first brought before the Senate, and instead of an objection being made a motion was made to refer the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. But that motion has been withdrawn, and now the Senator objects.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not too late for another objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I started out with the impression that the Senator from Connecticut would object. This resolution calls upon the bank in New York and the other banks to give to the Senate certain information pertaining to the conduct and the activity of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks in politics. It is information to which the Senate is entitled. It is information I believe every fair-minded Senator on the other side will agree I am entitled to as a Senator in this body; but the Senator from Connecticut always has his eagle eye out for any approach of anything toward a bank and the control of the volume of money and of credits. He is always Johnny-on-the-spot then. I have not seen him so closely in attendance on this floor for quite a while as he has been this morning, when he was doubtless looking for this resolution to be called up.

The Senator has a right to object; I am not criticizing him for that; but I am criticizing the fact that he does object under the circumstances. It is hard for me to work out just why a Senator would object to having this information furnished to another Senator, and to the Senate and the country, under the circumstances.

What is it in this body or in the Government that has such a powerful influence that a simple request of this kind can not be granted by one Senator to another? In small affairs the Senator is very courteous. The Senator asks, "Were you interested?" "Yes." "It pertains to you and your State?" "Certainly." "You are involved in it, and you want this information?" "Certainly." "I have no objection." That is the way it is done in things that do not involve big things. But you tread on the toes of one of these great octopuses that has its tentacles running out around the necks of every character of business in the country, you dare to insult it by calling on it to give you information through a resolution of this lawmaking body of the Nation, and somebody is right on the spot to object.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that the New York World, on which he relies a great deal, is authority for the statement that the banking interests of my State have united to defeat my reelection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did not hear what paper said that, but if the banking interests are fighting the Senator from Connecticut they are fighting one of the most enthusiastic representatives they have ever had upon this floor. I like to read the New York World, a Democratic paper, but whenever they say anything like that about the Senator from Connecticut they sure miscued on him. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLEAN. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama would like to know the reason assigned for this opposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not time to yield to the Senator to give the reason, because I want to finish my remarks.

Mr. McLEAN. It is due to the fact that I am in favor of the soldiers' compensation act.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is at least one redeeming trait, but how any man who is a friend of the soldier boys, believing in giving justice to them, can stand up on this floor and oppose immediate consideration of a resolution like mine I can not understand.

Mr. President, the question involved here is a serious one. It was raised when "Old Hickory" Jackson was in the White House, when he dared "call" the money power. Trusts have multiplied, and they are multiplying now. They are springing up overnight. They are increasing on every hand. Big predatory interests are rampant in the Republic. The greatest trust of them all, the most deadly and dangerous of them all, is the Money Trust, and the people know it. That trust controls the lifeblood of business. It holds its hand on the currency system and on the credit system of the country, and that trust is stalking about the door of every kind of business in the Republic, and whenever you get anywhere in its neighborhood it is difficult to get unanimous consent for anything that even remotely concerns it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that a New York paper this morning states that there are 19 men in that State who have a net income per annum of $1,000,000 and more.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, Mr. President, and if they would tell the truth there are more than that. There are more than that in Wall Street proper. I noticed in the papers this morning a statement that the amount collected by the Government from income tax had fallen off in the last year. One of two things has happened: You have excused men who ought to pay money into the Treasury, you have permitted them by some hook or crook to dodge the taxgatherer, you have permitted them to evade their just share of the tax burden of the Government, or you have so choked the instrumentalities of business that business has fallen off, is paralyzed, and they have not produced generally as they did before. One of those things is certain to be true. Yet, this morning, this fine June day, when I offer a resolution simply calling on the banks to give this information, which would take but a little while to consider and would not cost the Government a cent, the Senator from Connecticut has forced me to consume time to discuss the matter, which I expect to do whenever a thing comes up like this so patent on its face that it is fair and just and reasonable. So I must talk into the RECORD that is a perpetual record in the country. The people who read the thirty thousand and odd copies of the RECORD that go out of here each day are entitled to know on just which side Senators are when questions come up here for consideration.

There are two sides to these questions. There is always a right side and a wrong side. I would be willing almost to submit my case to any unbiased Republican in the country and say to him: "Do you not believe I am entitled to this information?" I believe that the average Republican on the other side of the aisle would say yes. There is nothing complicated about the resolution. A committee is not required to investigate it. It simply calls upon the banks to give the information. Did you circulate Senator GLASS's speech? How much did it cost? To whom did you send it? At whose expense did you send it?

Mr. President, what is wrong or unfair in that? Why can not the Senate pass that resolution? But the Senator from Connecticut halts it. He stops it right at the threshhold. He refuses to allow it to be passed. He refuses to permit it to be considered this day. He suggests that that simple, plain, straightforward, honest resolution be referred to the committee over which he presides and where my other resolution still sleeps and will sleep until Gabriel blows his horn. He rises in his affable manner, smiling and bowing, and asks me to let this resolution go down to his committee. "Walk into my parlor," said the spider to the fly. Oh, Mr. President, you know what happens to the fly when he gets in there. They soon have a very nice situation. The spider and the fly lie down together, but the fly is inside the spider. [Laughter.] He tells us they want to investigate this resolution. What is there about it that needs investigation? I have stated it. It is a simple, straightforward request to these 11 banks to make this report to the Senate of the United States. This great body is entitled to that information. I want that information. I am entitled to it. I would not deny any Senator on the floor that information if he sought it, but here I am held up by the Senator from Connecticut. Why?

Mr. President, I know why. We can not put anything through here at all that would injuriously affect those who can fix interest rates as they please and gouge the people on loans at every turn in the road. We can not get anything through here by unanimous consent that affects predatory interests. They are too powerful. There are people who lean on them for support in elections and they are not going to permit a request to go through by unanimous consent to investigate them or to have them do something that will give information to the Senate revealing that they have been circulating a speech that defended their conduct. They do not wish to give to the Senate the facts as to who suggested that the speech be sent out and at whose expense it was sent out.

Mr. President, we can get through resolutions that do not affect any big concern, but let us come in with one that goes to the sore spot, that aims at the biggest trust of them all, the Money Trust, and we can not get very far with it by unanimous consent in this Republican Senate.

Mr. President, it ought not to have taken more than one minute to pass my resolution. My other resolution was passed in a minute or two. The bank at Atlanta has responded. Now, here is the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. MCLEAN, sitting in the Chamber when the resolution is read, and he halts it and asks that it be not considered but sent to his committee. I most respectfully protest against that. I do not want it to go to his committee. I have said that the other resolution was never acted upon, that I was not treated right about that, and the public was not treated right. I am entitled to object to sending this resolution to that commitee. I am entitled to ask its immediate consideration. But the Senator from Connecticut objects to its present consideration and that ends it, Mr. President. Of course I can not get action upon it now.

Mr. President, I am going to ask that the resolution lie on the Vice President's table. The Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn his motion to refer it to the committee and objected to the immediate consideration of the resolution. I therefore ask that it remain on the Vice President's table and that the tariff bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Republican platform of 1904 declared:

> The measure of protection should always at least equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

The Republican platform of 1908 repeated this declaration and declared against "excessive duties."

In the tariff bill of 1909 the Republican leaders in Congress disappointed the confidence of the country by writing a bill full of "excessive duties," with average duties in every schedule greatly in excess of the total labor cost in such commodities and in many of them running from 100 per cent up to 800 per cent above the total cost of labor. During the discussion of that bill I presented to the Senate a table demonstrating the accuracy of that statement. I ask unanimous consent that the table may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table is as follows:

Estimated revenues.

[1] Percentage of wages to value of product calculated and inserted by R. L. OWEN.

[2] Industries grouped to conform as nearly as possible with the articles enumerated in the respective schedules of the tariff law. Industries with products named in two or more schedules are credited to the schedule which includes the major product. The value of products for each group is the sum of all products of all industries in the group, and hence includes a large amount of duplication due to the product of one industry serving as material for another.

[3] Should be $56,796,143; addition erroneous.

[4] Should be $767,401,417; addition erroneous.

[5] Should be $273,959,320 (see p. 67).

[6] Should be $1,495,686,437 (see p. 67).

[7] Should be $2,277,838,543.

[8] Should be $13,270,192,088.

Mr. OWEN. The table which I have inserted in my remarks completely exposes the pretense that the duties imposed are justified on the theory of protecting labor, because the percentage of labor in the products on the chemical schedule, for example, as to the value of the product, averaged 7.5 per cent, while the duties imposed were 28.20 per cent. If labor cost nothing in Europe, 7.5 per cent would be the maximum duty permissible for purely protective purposes on the commodities of the chemical schedule, but the duties imposed were put at 28.20 per cent on such articles, or 400 per cent of the total labor cost.

The total percentage of labor cost in Schedule I, the cotton-goods schedule, was 21.4 per cent. The maximum permissible, if European labor cost nothing, would be 21.4 per cent for protective purposes, but the schedule of duties was fixed at 47.14 per cent, over 200 per cent of the total labor cost.

In Schedule K, woolen manufactures, the labor cost was 17.6 per cent on such commodities, while the duty imposed was 58.19 per cent, over 300 per cent of the total labor cost.

And so throughout the schedules, as set forth above and for convenience compacted into the following table:

Manufacturing schedules.	Total labor cost.	Tariff rate.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
A.—Chemicals	8.0	28.20
B.—Glassware	37.1	48.70
C.—Metal goods	12.7	31.65
D.—Wooden goods	27.1	11.21
E.—Sugar, etc	5.6	65.30
F.—Tobaccos	18.9	87.18
G.—Provisions	5.7	33.28
H.—Beverages	8.9	88.89
I.—Cotton goods	26.0	47.14
J.—Flax, hemp, jute	13.3	44.07
K.—Wool goods	19.7	58.19
L.—Silk goods	22.6	60.76
M.—Paper and books	16.2	21.88
N.—Sundries	19.9	23.06

The calculation of the percentage of labor cost to the value of products is made from figures taken from the United States census and will be found in my address of June 15, 1909, page 3261, and following. The present bill makes these duties much higher, without any justification whatever unless fancied political expediency can be deemed justification.

I demanded at the time of the managers of the bill that they explain these excessive duties on the ground of protecting labor in America and they were unable to do so. I challenge the present Republican leaders now to justify these excessive duties on the theory of honest protection. The only theory that can justify a charge higher than the total labor cost in a commodity is on the theory of producing revenue, and even this theory does not justify such an interference with commerce.

The Democratic Party has justified its schedules in the past on the ground of favoring a tariff for revenue and have most unwisely used the term for revenue "only," when in sober truth every revenue tariff ever passed by the Democrats contained duties higher than were necessary to protect American labor.

As a lifelong Democrat believing that commerce should be interfered with as little as possible by government, I should be perfectly content with a tariff that would truly impose duties measuring merely "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," that would give full honest protection. There is always the additional protection to American manufacturers by as much as the freight across 3,000 miles of water and the insurance and port charges would be added to such duties.

In addition to such protection I should be willing to add for full good measure 10 per cent, because I am more than willing, as I believe all other Democrats are, to give honest protection to meritorious American industries. What I vigorously object to, what all Democrats object to, are duties so excessive, so far above "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," as to engender and protect monopoly and make effective a substantial robbery of the consumers of the country. The plain truth is, Mr. President, that both the Democratic tariff and the Republican tariff are much higher than such a tariff as would impose duties equal to the difference in cost of production plus 10 per cent or plus 20 per cent or plus 50 per cent on an average of the schedules.

The truth is, Mr. President, that whether the Democratic committees or Republican committees are writing these tariff schedules they are subjected to the pressure of special interests, of parliamentary solicitors, of gentlemen of the finest manners, of the greatest social talents who subject the committeemen and Congressmen to blandishments and cajoleries that are irresistible, while the inarticulate mass of the people of America who pay the prices arising under the shelter of these high duties do not seem to be adequately represented in such ex parte pleadings.

As a consequence the tariff duties, whether Republican or Democratic, are far higher than are required on the principles of protection honestly and faithfully applied. It is easy to impose upon Congress. Here comes this present tariff bill of over 400 pages and with four or five thousand items on these schedules based on evidence taken without the safeguard of an oath, with no legal penalties for imposing upon Congress or abusing its confidence and with volumes of evidence running into thousands of pages.

Members of Congress, in addition to passing on the involved questions of duties on thousands of items, have very many other things to do in conducting the affairs of this gigantic Government, and the capacity of men—and if I say it without offense, even of Congressmen—is limited.

Mr. President, I am in favor of a scientific tariff removed from politics. I am perfectly willing to study the tariff schedules, but I know equally well the futility of it. When the tariff bill of 1909 was being considered, my remarks on June 15, 1909, took 60 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It was a very careful analysis; it was work faithfully done; it would make an ordinary octavo book of 350 pages, but of what use was it? The partisan leaders had determined to give the special interests in this country whatever they wanted, and the schedules were put through accordingly. It is true that it caused a revolt in the country when the people realized the injury to their business enterprises and to the consumers, and then followed a reaction with the Democrats in power, who proceeded to rewrite the tariff bill for revenue purposes, which involved exceedingly high protection nevertheless. The Democrats have always intended to give incidental protection. They have given, incidentally, protection far more than is necessary in my judgment, and without apparently realizing the fact.

I am willing, as a Democrat, and I believe the Democratic leaders are willing, to give full protection up to "the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," but I am opposed to "excessive duties." The Democrats of the country are opposed to "excessive duties," and I believe that nine-tenths of the Republicans are opposed to "excessive duties." Those who favor excessive duties—the very rich and powerful—who seek to establish monopolies by cutting off foreign competition, dare not say as much to the American people and can only put over such high schedules and monopoly protecting and monopoly engendering duties under the color of party loyalty and patriotism and the protection of labor. The plea of political expediency covers a multitude of sins.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the present bill to be inserted on a suitable page and line:

The United States Tariff Commission is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad of every article imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions where duty is imposed on such article. The said commission is directed to calculate the specific duty equal to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad of such article, which, with 10 per cent added thereto, shall be published by said commission as the duty fixed upon such article by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, this provision or its equivalent will put an end to upsetting the business of the United States every time there is a change of parties in our national elections.

Under this plan scientific honesty can be made to replace political expediency, logrolling, false testimony, and "excessive duties."

Congress will be able to transact the national business without being torn to pieces by trying to do the impracticable and impossible duty of passing on the duties of 4,000 commodities which fluctuate in value from time to time.

It will put an end to depressions due to uncertainties with regard to tariff duties.

It will remove as far as practicable unnecessary obstructions to international commerce.

It will enable Europe to pay its debts to America which can not be done under a prohibitive tariff, as these debts must be paid in commodities.

It will expand our foreign commerce and give new markets to our manufacturers, because it is impossible in the long run for one nation to ship more to another nation than it receives. Whatever we buy from abroad we pay for in terms of our own commodities, and the more we buy from abroad the more we will ship abroad. This everlasting truth can never be broken, and when the world fully understands it, as hundreds of thousands do understand it, it will be discovered that it is to the interest of all mankind to interpose as few obstructions as possible in our domestic or in our international commerce. The one gigantic fact which has made America prosperous, exceedingly prosperous, has been the complete freedom from interference in our interchange of commodities between the 48 States of the Union. That is why America has built up the greatest domestic commerce of any like number of people in the world; that is why America has developed the greatest banking power in the world with nearly fifty billions of assets.

Mr. President, I appeal to my Republican associates, who love their country as well as I, to take the tariff out of politics and give our people a scientific administration in the imposition of duties which shall afford honest protection and nothing more than protection. Let us raise our revenue by other means than choking the arteries of commerce and obstructing the flow of commodities into and from our country which has grown rich and powerful at home by freedom of commerce at home.

No Republican can justify himself in voting against the amendment I propose on the ground that it is unconstitutional or on the ground that it delegates the legislative power. The Republican Members are precluded from making this charge because they have given to the President in this very bill powers greatly in excess of what I propose the United States Tariff Commission shall exercise.

In fact, I do not propose to give the Tariff Commission any power except to make mathematical calculations based upon the evidence which they are directed to take. The duties which I propose by this amendment are fixed by Congress as a legislative act, leaving to the Tariff Commission the mathematical calculations based upon facts which they are directed to ascertain.

Congress can not fix railroad rates or tariff rates as a practical matter. Its legislative powers can be exercised in a practical way and this must be done through laying down the principles and permitting the Executive to discharge the administrative duties fixed by Congress under its legislative authority.

It will be observed that I propose to give the Tariff Commission no power whatever to fix the rate. Under the amendment which I propose the rate is fixed by the legislative power of the Congress of the United States at a point which shall "equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad," leaving the ascertainment of the facts to an administrative board charged with the duty of working out the mathematics thereof, a rate which may and will fluctuate from time to time but which will always represent the legislative will of Congress, will always be absolutely fair to American producers, equally fair to foreign producers, and, above all, fair to the consuming public of the United States, and beneficial to our manufacturers in America who will find their foreign markets expanded under this system

Under the amendment I propose the legislative will is expressed with as much precision as is humanly possible, and the legislative will, if this be the legislative will, can not be carried out practically except by the use of some such administrative agency.

It is obvious that under our present practice the collector of the port of New York, for example, exercises just such an administrative power under the present tariff act. He uses his judgment on the classification of the goods imported; he determines the quality of the goods; he determines the value of the goods; he applies the principle of the act, whether ad valorem or specific, and his deputies figure up the mathematics in each individual instance. The parallel is complete. No one may properly assert that Congress has a right to declare as its legislative will that the tariff shall equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and then have no power to put that legislative will into effect.

I am informed with regard to the authorities cited by the Senator from Montana, May 8, 1922, RECORD, page 6494, and so forth, and these decisions, in my judgment, are wise and right, and they do not in the slightest degree abate the force of my contention, while they do apply to the undefined powers attempted to be conveyed to the President by the pending bill and which would transfer to him legislative power which Congress has no right to do. I give notice, Mr. President, that at the proper time I shall demand the yeas and nays on my proposed amendment.

I listened with interest this morning to the address of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. He demonstrated to my entire satisfaction that under the existing condition of the retail markets of this country there is no need for any increase in the protective duty, for he showed us case after case where the foreign goods in competition with American goods were selling at 100 per cent, 200 per cent, 500 per cent, and 1,000 per cent above the actual cost of the article plus the duty. For the purposes of revenue his argument is valid, for if such prices are being obtained from the consuming public in America by the retailers, there is a wide margin there, of which the Government of the United States may take advantage for revenue purposes, but for the purpose of protection there is no intellectual justification in the argument of the Senator from Indiana.

It is shown from the evidence which the Senator has submitted and which other Senators on the other side of the Chamber have submitted that there is, in fact, in this country a profiteering going on in the retail business. That demonstration is complete as made by Senators who have addressed the Senate with regard to various articles. If they take the position that such high prices ought to be abated, I agree with them; but no step is being taken to abate them. I think it ought to be made a criminal offense in the District of Columbia, for example, where Congress has authority, for the retailer to charge over 100 per cent profit on the articles which he is retailing to the public. There ought to be some limitation somewhere on prices. Whether the party in power has the courage to apply itself to the discharge of that duty, I do not know. That remains to be determined by the action taken by my friends on the other side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Harreld	McNary	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may venture to delay the unfinished business of the Senate for a moment or two, I desire to make some brief observations upon the question that has been most discussed to-day.

Since making an address to the Senate on the 16th and 17th of last January, in which I endeavored to present an exposition of the Federal reserve act and a defense of its administration, I have very carefully refrained from all participation in subsequent discussions of the question. I rather felicitate myself that the address which I did venture to make seems to have been so complete in all of its details and its deductions that the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] appears to have found it necessary to attempt to reply to it about 40 or 50 times. I have not found it either desirable or necessary to make any response whatsoever to what that Senator has said about my first and only speech on the subject; and not until to-day, when I was drawn into a most distasteful notoriety by the episode to which the Senate was a witness, have I even ventured to interrupt the Senator from Alabama, or to correct any of his multitudinous inaccurate references to me personally and to the subject upon which we disagree. I rise now only to set myself right with respect to one aspect of this matter.

The Senator from Alabama said that I had not objected to the consideration of this or any other resolution which he has presented having as its purpose a disclosure of certain facts as to the distribution of my speech by the banks of the country; and that is true. I have not objected, and I do not intend to object; but frankness compels me to say that I have not objected only because it is my speech that is involved always in the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama. I have not objected merely through a sense of delicacy and furthermore through conscious indifference to the whole matter at issue. I do not care who knows what banks have circulated my speech or how many have been circulated. I could have given the Senator all the information which he seems to desire on the subject long ago had he made a simple inquiry of me as to what banks had circulated my speech and as to how many had been circulated.

Of one thing the Senate may be entirely assured, and that is that I never asked or suggested in the remotest way that any bank or anybody else circulate a single one of my speeches. I had a moderate number of copies of the speech printed on my own account, in response to thousands of requests from various parts of the country for copies of the address. I had them printed at my own expense and circulated only in response to these requests; so that I have been indifferent to this furore over the circulation of my speech by the banks of the country; and, as I have indicated, through a sense of delicacy have made no objection to these resolutions of inquiry. I do not care to have it understood, however, that my judgment sanctions anything of the sort. I think the Senate has nothing whatsoever to do with the circulation of anybody's speech by any private banking institution of the United States.

It is not an unusual thing for banking institutions to establish and conduct publicity departments. I venture to say that there is not a bank of considerable importance in the United States which has not a publicity bureau. I have on my desk right now a pile of literature circulated from time to time by banking institutions in the United States and in other countries. The great banking institutions of Great Britain and Germany and France have their publicity departments and send out, if not every week, at least once every month, their literature, discussing economic problems and the relation of political movements to the business interests of these respective countries.

At least 20 of the great banks in New York City have their publicity bureaus and each week issue these pamphlets discussing political questions in their relation to the business interests of the country. So that there was nothing of an unusual nature about the circulation by these banks of a speech made by a public man in the Senate of the United States.

I may say, in passing, that it was not a political address. I defy anybody on earth to read it from the beginning to the end and say, from its contents, whether the man who delivered the speech was a Democrat or a Republican. It undertook to discuss no political aspect or phase of the problem whatsoever. It was strictly and exclusively an economic discussion, so much so that 23 State universities and colleges, including some of the great educational institutions of the United States, have adopted it as a textbook to be taught to their classes in economics. So I say it was in no sense a political address.

As to the right of the Senate to make inquiry into the matter, had I not been involved, or had my speech not been involved, I should undoubtedly have objected to the right of the Senate to make any inquiry into the matter at all. It has been said here that the Federal reserve banks are the creatures of the Congress, and they are. So are the national banks the creatures of the Congress of the United States. They operate under precisely the same charter rights as are possessed by the Federal reserve banks. But they are private institutions. Like the Federal reserve banks, they pay to the Government a franchise tax, and that is all. The Government of the United States has not furnished one dollar of the capital of the national banking institutions and the Government has not furnished one dollar of the capital of Federal reserve banks.

National banking institutions are owned and operated by their private stockholders, who contribute to their capital and manage the institutions. Federal reserve banks are owned and operated by the stockholding member banks. The United States Government has never contributed a dime to their capital stock.

The Senate of the United States has as much right to-day to ask or to require the Irving National Bank of New York, or the First National Bank of St. Louis, or any other individual national banking institution in the United States, to furnish an individual Senator with its mailing list, or to furnish the Senate with its mailing list, as it has to ask or to require one of the Federal reserve banks to furnish the Senate or any individual Senator with its private mailing list.

It has just as much right to ask or require an individual national bank operating under its Federal charter to furnish a Senator with a list of its depositors or of its borrowers, as it has to require it to furnish its private mailing list to a Senator for the purpose of dispatching an address of his to the bank's correspondents; and it has no right to do either. The only interest of a pecuniary nature the United States has in a national bank is that a national bank shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a franchise tax from its earnings, and the only pecuniary interest the United States Government has in a Federal reserve bank is that it shall pay into the Treasury of the United States a percentage of its net earnings as a franchise tax to the Government, after it has made the earnings.

The United States Senate has not hitherto bothered itself or concerned itself with the detailed operations of individual national banks, nor has it concerned itself or bothered about the detailed operations of Federal reserve banks. It might as well require these banks, of either character, to furnish it with a statement of the amount of ice water drunk by its employees as to furnish the Senate with its private mailing lists.

I have said this much, Mr. President, only to elucidate, as I think, the apparent misconception in this body of what a Federal reserve bank is, and of what the relation of the Government, or the legislative branch of the Government, is to these banks, and that is all. There seems to be a misconception as to this, even on the part of the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, because in a qualified way he promised the Senator from Alabama to report back this resolution. I want to say that if it is the deliberate judgment of the Senate that this body has a right minutely to inquire into the private business operations of a national bank because it possesses a Federal charter, or a Federal reserve bank because it is operating under an identical Federal charter, there is no need whatsoever to refer this or any kindred resolution to the Banking and Currency Committee for report, and I shall advise that the unanimous consent be given to exact this information, and explicitly to require these banks to furnish a Senator with their private mailing lists in order that he may dispatch his speech or speeches to the persons with whom these banks are accustomed to do business.

If that is the view of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, if he thinks it is a proper exercise of the Senate's power to engage in that sort of thing, I should advise that he withdraw his objection and let these banks be by this method coerced into disclosing their private business affairs to the Senate of the United States, albeit by doing so the substantial operation of these banks is interfered with.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I assumed that the Senator from Alabama requested this information from the Federal reserve banks and had no application to the national banks. Inasmuch as the Federal reserve banks are more or less under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, and their directors are chosen by the Federal Reserve Board, it seemed to me that they did stand in a relation a little different from that of the national banks in so far as their operations are concerned and that it might be proper for the Senate to request information from one of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that in the matter of control the individual national bank, operating under an identical charter, is very much more subject to Government control than a Federal reserve bank. The national banks are put under the absolute control of a single man, to wit, the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. McLEAN. The directorship of a national bank is entirely private, and the Senator knows that some of the directors of the Federal reserve banks are chosen by the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Reserve Board is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Without giving the matter much thought, it seemed to me that the relationship was much more intimate between a Federal reserve bank and the Government than between a national bank and the Government in any matter which related to expenditure, or, if you please, to the sending out of public documents, or things of that kind, and that a resolution of inquiry might properly emanate from the Senate. I have not given the matter very much thought, but I still think that it would be in order for the Senate to request any information it desires to receive from the Federal reserve system, confining it to the Federal reserve banking system.

Mr. GLASS. In my judgment, the relationship is very much less intimate with respect to the Federal reserve banks than with respect to individual national banks. It is conceivable that if a charge of fraudulent transactions or flagrant mismanagement of a Federal reserve bank should be made, a joint resolution by the two Houses of Congress for an inquiry as to the facts might be proper; but even in that case Congress itself has established a central board to supervise the operations of these banks, and it very properly relies upon the scrutiny and viligance of that board to control any matter of that description.

But let us not be deceived about the nature of this inquiry. The whole purpose of it was frankly avowed here to-day by the Senator from Alabama, and it is that these banks may be by the Senate compelled to furnish him with their private mailing lists in order that he may utilize those lists for the purpose of posting copies of his speeches to people who do business with those banks. The Senator has made no concealment of that purpose on his part. Now, then, will the Senate proceed logically to require those banks, at the expense of their private stockholding banks, some of them State banks, to have printed and purchased the speeches of the Senator from Alabama, and to circulate them at the expense of their stockholding banks, notwithstanding their judgment may entirely disapprove of what the Senator from Alabama has said; albeit they may think that his construction of the Federal reserve banking system is totally at fault, saturated with prejudice, with no intelligent conception of the real purpose and meaning of the law? Is it the idea of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that the Senate must proceed in that fashion; that just because a bank has circulated an address of a Senator giving an economic exposition of an economic problem, without one semblance of politics in it, therefore those banks must be compelled, at the expense of their private stockholding banks, to circulate an antagonistic view of the banking system, one that charges its officials with murder, that charges it with having pauperized a great section of the country, notably the State of Alabama, that charges its officials with graft and dishonesty?

How unreasonable, Mr. President, it was in the officials of these banks to circulate an economic address that conservatively sought to defend them against charges of graft and theft and assassination! What are these bank officials that they should resent imputations of that sort against their character? These men who are selected by the individual National and State member banks of the system, presumptively for their ability and their strict integrity and their scientific knowledge of the banking business of the United States—who are they that they should presume to object to these characterizations and in disproof of them circulate an address which merely undertakes to recite in perfectly respectful terms the accomplishments of those banks during a given period? Is that political propaganda? Is that an attempt to seize and control the Government of the United States? Is that properly any reflection upon the Senate of the United States? Is any Senator here alarmed over the modest wish of these bank officials that they, by the circulation of a public address, might be exculpated from these violent charges of graft and rascality and merciless oppression of certain classes of their fellow citizens?

I do not think, Mr. President, that the Senate properly has any right to ask or to require these banks to furnish one of its Members with their private mailing list in order, as he avows, that he may thereby be enabled to send the men with whom those banks do business his speech or speeches. So far as I am concerned, I would not object for one moment, vocally or mentally, to having the Senator's speech put in the hands of every intelligent man, woman, and child in the United States. I would not object for one moment to having that done. If he thinks it is an answer to the speech which I ventured to make, I felicitate him upon his happy frame of mind. I shall not undertake to deny to him the satisfaction of feeling that he has really answered my speech. If he can possibly get anybody else to concur in that belief, I should be cheerfully willing to afford him all the facilities and all the opportunities that he might desire. But I do not think the Senate has any right to do it at the expense of the Federal reserve banks, owned by their stockholding banks and which, in my view, have a right, if they are going to circulate literature at all, to circulate literature which commends itself to their judgment rather than literature which does not commend itself to their judgment.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I have to say about the matter. If it is the view of the Senate that it has a right to do this, I am in favor of speeding the proposition rather than delaying it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Chair recognized me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HEFLIN. I, of course, have been referred to in the speech of the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have several times deferred what I have to say and I would like to proceed.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall wait until the Senator from North Carolina concludes, and then I shall reply to the Senator from Virginia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 154. An act for the relief of Arthur E. Rump;

S. 156. An act for the relief of the heirs of Julio Carrazco, deceased;

S. 426. THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] delivered this morning, and the exhibits which he made to the Senate in connection with his speech, were a mere continuation of the speech and exhibits made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] a few days ago. The speech added a few articles, principally of a trifling character so far as the part they play in our national trade is concerned, to the rather unimportant objects of commerce exhibited by the Senator from North Dakota. The line of thought was exactly the same. So that I think it may be very truly said of the speech of the Senator from Indiana, that while admirable in its delivery, while exceedingly interesting as all of his performances are, it added no new thought and no new facts to the tariff discussion. The speech really does not require an answer. The answer has been made already to the speech of the Senator from North Dakota. That answer has been accepted by the press of the country as overwhelming and conclusive.

As a tariff argument, of course, the speeches of both the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Indiana, if I may use the terms without offense, because I certainly intend none, were quite preposterous and ridiculous. I do not understand that either of the two distinguished Senators made his speech as a part of any tariff argument. I tested out the Senator from Indiana to-day, as by some questions I think I tested out the Senator from North Dakota the other day, asking him whether or not he was really presenting the argument and exhibits as a tariff argument, and I think the answer shows conclusively that neither of them thought anything of either the talk or the exhibits as a tariff argument in favor of the pending bill. Both of them seemed to admit, and did admit, as I understood them, that the purpose of their speeches was not to demonstrate the sufficiency or the insufficiency of a given rate of duty, but the purpose was to indict, so to speak, the importer and certain newspapers of the country upon the ground that they were either, in the case of the importers, selfishly interested and therefore their opposition to the bill should be discredited, or, in the case of the newspapers, especially those of the political faith of the sponsors of this bill, unduly, if not corruptly, influenced by the importers.

Mr. President, we dealt with that phase of the situation very thoroughly in the discussion a few days ago. The same charge was made and the answer was given. I should not now take the floor for the purpose of again answering that suggestion, and I say that is all in the Senator's speech to answer, because as a tariff argument he admits that it is beside the mark; it is a mere argument for the purpose of convicting those who oppose the bill as opposing it through improper motives. Feeling that way about it, I should not take the floor at all to-day if it were not for the fact that I have a few little exhibits which I myself wish to present and which I think will be somewhat interesting to Senators on both sides of the Chamber and will also be somewhat interesting to the country. However, Mr. President, so long as the indictment has been repeated against the importers and the newspapers and additional facts along the same line have been adduced and additional argument along the same line has been indulged in, I want briefly—not elaborately at all—to review those arguments.

Mr. President, these exhibits have been presented here by the two Senators to whom I have referred for the purpose of showing that the importers of the United States who are sometimes connected with the department stores, as is charged, are unduly profiteering upon the American people in selling the articles which are purchased from abroad. What is the evidence of that charge? It is a serious charge to make against any class of business people who stand well, as do the American importers, for generally they are American citizens, although one might not think so to judge by what Senators on the other side say of them, and those citizens interested in the department stores. What is the evidence upon which it is sought to convict these two great interests in the United States of opposing this piece of proposed legislation, claimed to be in the interest of the people, from selfish or greedy and improper motives? What is the testimony? The testimony is the ex parte statement of two propositions, and only two: First, that the foreign selling cost of the imported article appears to be low, and, second, that the retail selling price of the particular article in this country appears to be very high; in other words, it is sought to convict this class of business men of the United States of improper motives because of the alleged big spread between the wholesale price of the imported article and the retail price at which that article is sold in the American market.

Mr. President, it is clear that if this charge were made in a court of justice no prejudicial inference could be drawn from those two facts against the department stores or the importers. It is evident that the essential fact necessary to support and sustain the conclusion which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] attempt to draw has been left out and suppressed, and that no effort on our part to pry out of them these facts, if indeed they possess them, has been successful. I undertake to say that if those two Senators were proceeding in a court against the importers and the department stores to prove a charge of profiteering on articles brought from abroad they would not only present to the jury the wholesale selling price of the foreign article, but that they would present to the jury and they would feel that they had made out no case unless they presented to the jury at the same time as an essential part of the evidence the wholesale selling price of the comparable American article. Nor would they think that their case was completed when they presented the wholesale selling price in the American market of the foreign article unless they at the same time presented the retail selling price of the comparable domestic product in the American market.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be glad if the Senator from Oklahoma would not interrupt the line of thought I have in mind just now. I will yield to him a little later on.

Mr. OWEN. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say those facts are absolutely necessary to make out the case and support the charge which is made against these reputable business men. Why did the distinguished Senators not present those facts? Is it because they were not in possession of them? Mr. President, as to these little trifling articles of commerce which they have exhibited to the Senate and to the country, it would have been just as easy to obtain the wholesale selling price of the comparable American article as it was to obtain the selling price of the foreign article. It would have been just as easy for them to have ascertained the retail selling price of the comparable domestic article as it was to ascertain the retail selling price of the foreign article.

That suggestion was brought to the attention of the Senator from North Dakota a few days ago when he presented his argument. He must have seen its force. The country saw it; the American press saw it; it was not hidden from anybody. It may be said that he had inadvertently failed to get those facts and present them to the Senate; but I maintain and I submit that when four or five days afterwards another majority member of the Finance Committee makes exactly the same argument, presents exactly the same facts, and neglects, as the Senator from North Dakota neglected in his speech, to present these additional and essential facts, which might in the meantime easily have been ascertained, it is apparent they do not desire to present to the country a comparison between these prices.

Oh, Mr. President, it is incredible that Senators who are here voting to impose taxes upon these articles have not already in their possession the evidence showing the difference between the wholesale price of the foreign articles which they have mentioned, all of which are covered in the tariff bill, and the wholesale selling price of the American article. To say that they are not in possession of both of those facts is to say that they knew nothing about the very fundamental facts that must lie at the bottom of the rates proposed according to the theory upon which they claim they framed this bill.

They say they framed it with the idea of bringing up the wholesale selling price of the imported article to the level of the wholesale selling price of the domestic article. If they framed it upon that theory, it is criminal negligence for them to stand here and say, "We have the wholesale selling price of the foreign article, but we are not able to present to the country the wholesale selling price of the domestic article." That is convicting themselves of having framed this bill upon a certain theory and being ignorant of the facts that were necessary to enable them to apply that theory to a given object.

They have no time to look up these essential facts in connection with this question, Mr. President, or they refuse to do it; they have no time to give the country information to enable the people to discover whether the serious charge against large and influential classes in the United States, embracing the press itself, incidentally, may be sustained; they have no time to find out the facts that would enable us to test the truth of their charge. They have had no time until recently even to discuss the schedules of this bill; they were so pressed that they insisted upon voting without serious and due consideration and discussion of the items; and yet, Mr. President, when it comes to preferring infamous charges against the newspapers of this country, including the Republican press as well as the Democratic and the nonpartisan press, these Senators not only take two or three days of the time of the Senate in trying to bolster up this unfounded charge but they have men scouring the country, rushing from port to port, from store to store, with a view to finding some exceptional or freak importations upon which to make a charge, and leave out in the making of that charge the vital evidence necessary to give it force and effect.

Mr. President, it is charged that the importer is also the retailer, and therefore that we should look at the importer in a very different light from that in which we look at the American wholesaler, because the wholesaler is not a retailer, although, as a matter of fact, many of them do retail as well as wholesale business. There is but little significance in the fact that some of the articles that have been exhibited here were sold by the same concerns that imported them. So far as the spread is concerned, the spread in that case would naturally be very much the same as the spread between the wholesale selling price and the retail selling price. Why? Because the importer—he may be a department-store head—must pay the overhead charges of importation. He can not import without paying the same overhead charges that any other importer has to incur. He can not then sell as a retail dealer without incurring also the overhead charges of the retailer; and so, in the case of the importer who is also a retailer, against that particular object of merchandise we have the item of the overhead of the importer as well as the overhead of the retailer to take into account, and then to that must be added the profits. I say, therefore, that there is very little difference between that case and that of the importer who sells to the retailer.

Is the importer who in also a retailer practicing extortion upon the public as a retailer? Mr. President, we can not tell unless we ascertain whether or not he is charging the American consumer a higher retail price for the foreign article than his competitor is charging the American consumer for an American-produced article at retail. This much is absolutely apparent, that the high retail prices at which these articles have been declared to have been sold in the American market could not have been realized for those articles in this market unless the American product had been sold at retail for as high a price as that paid for the foreign article. If the importers of foreign products were able to command high prices for those products in the American market—prices that seem to be outrageous profiteering—it is because their competitors, dealing in American-produced products at retail, have set the pace, and the importers are simply following them.

Why attack the importer's motives with respect to this bill under those circumstances and not at the same time attack the motives of the hundreds of thousands of retail merchants in this country from one end of it to the other who are denouncing this bill in unmeasured terms? Why single out the importer as a criminal? If he is a criminal because he exacts in the American market these high prices that are alleged to have been given, then it necessarily follows that the American retailer of domestic products is also a criminal. If the importer's motives must be attacked and his opposition to this bill attributed to selfishness and profiteering, upon the same theory every retailer in this country who is opposing this bill—and I say the great bulk of them are; nine out of ten of the retailers of this country, according to my information, are opposed to this bill—we might just as well denounce them and their opposition as to denounce the importer.

But, Mr. President, suppose that it be conceded—and, of course, it is not conceded—that the Senators have made out their case against the importers and the department-store people. Suppose they have shown that these men are outrageous profiteers in the retail market of the United States; that they are criminally guilty of extortion upon the people; and that they ought to be segregated from the American retail profiteer and punished and held up to the contempt of the Congress and the country. If they have established that, Mr. President, how have they made out their case against the newspapers?

I assume that these gentlemen are not after the importers and the department stores so much as they are after the newspapers of the country, the press of the country. That is their objective. We did not hear much talk about the activities and the sinister motives of these importers and department stores until we began to read into the RECORD these editorials from the great metropolitan newspapers of the country denouncing this bill in unmeasured terms. It was these editorials under which the Senators on the other side, in charge of this bill, squirmed and writhed. It was these editorials that drew their fire. But, Mr. President, it became necessary to ascribe a sinister and a corrupt motive to the newspapers, especially of the Republican press, that were so severely criticizing and denouncing this bill; and then for the first time, coming in force, in overwhelming force, we saw and heard these assaults upon the department stores and the importers. For what? For the purpose of fixing an ulterior and unworthy motive upon the newspapers for their attacks upon the bill.

When these great newspapers declared themselves, and when their lead was followed by the big papers of all the large towns of the country, without reference to whether they were importing centers or not, when Senators on the other side saw that the clamor against their bill, which started with these newspapers, was being taken up by the smaller dailies and weeklies throughout the country, and saw the number, day after day, of these assaults from Republican sources, from newspapers that had always supported the theory of protection and Republicanism, with respect to whose partisan Republican affiliations no question could be made, they saw the necessity of immediately finding some plausible excuse for that attitude on the part of this large number of newspapers throughout the country, not only of their own party, not only of the Democratic Party, but of the nonpartisan press, of the trade press. In fact, this movement was led by the commercial papers of New York and Chicago, and by the Republican papers of those cities and of other large centers. And so, Mr. President, the Senators from North Dakota and Indiana are simply using the department stores and the importers as the evidence in their indictment against the newspapers of the Republican faith in this country. I say that their evidence has broken down as against the importers and the department stores.

Mr. President, what has the Republican side of this Chamber to say with respect to the evidence which the able Senators representing the majority of the committee have presented here in an effort to convict the newspapers of the United States of corruption and of bribery through advertising? Where is the evidence?

Mr. President, has a more serious charge than that ever been framed or presented in the American Senate—a charge that the great newspapers, the chief sources of public information, constituting as they do one of the Republic's chief safeguards, have suddenly fallen from their high estate and surrendered their editorial and news columns to an unworthy assault upon a bill presented and sponsored by the party to which they belong and which they have so faithfully served in the past? I think no more serious charge than that was ever presented in the American Congress; and now, Mr. President, I ask what is the evidence upon which the majority side of this Chamber seek to convict the Republican press of this country who are opposing their bill of this infamous charge that they have leveled against it? Where is the evidence?

I say here now, and I challenge successful contradiction, that up to this time there is not one particle of evidence to sustain this charge against the newspapers of the United States except the bare, unsupported statements of those who have made the charge in the Senate. Therefore, I ask, have you proven your case? You certainly have not proven it as against the importers as to prices or against the department stores as to prices. Where is your evidence to establish your charge—a charge that involves and presupposes almost unspeakable venality on the part of a large and influential part of the press of the Republican Party?

Yet, Mr. President, to support these two charges, one against the importer and the second against the newspapers, Senators on the other side, who profess to be so anxious to facilitate the consideration of this bill and have so little time to devote to discussion and explanation, have taken two or three days' time trying to make out a case. That was the only object and purpose of the two spectacular speeches we have had and the two vaudeville tariff shows we have had in the Senate, according to the confession of both Senators.

Of course, we have shown that the Senators have failed to maintain either charge, first, because they would not get the essential evidence as to one, and it is a rule in the courts where I used to practice that whenever you catch a party to a suit suppressing a fact it is because he knows that its presentation would not advance his action, whatever its character might be.

They said we were going to have some more of these shows. I challenge them now, if they do make a third effort to convict these department stores and importers, to bring the essential evidence, the lack of which is now the fatal defect in their case against those stores and importers. I demand that if they are going to insist that this influence accounts for the attitude of the Republican press of this country, that they bring us some evidence other than their bare statements to sustain that charge.

I want to talk just a little while about these things which have been presented to us here to-day. We are here considering a very important bill. Evidence is to be brought here to accomplish a very serious purpose, to wit, the discrediting of the newspaper press of the country, and the conviction of certain great interests in this country of dishonest and corrupt motives, and extortion from the public. What have we had here before us?

We have had an exhibit of a number of little, trifling articles, gathered up with great care. It probably took several weeks for the flying squadron of appraisers, who have been out searching over the tomes of the customhouse to find some exceptional or freak importations, to gather up the articles exhibited by the Senator from North Dakota the other day. Then they rushed off to the department stores, or to the general merchandizing stores, of the great cities to see if they could not find that the articles had been sold at extortionate prices, and when they found they had been sold at the very same prices which the retail merchant was charging for the same or comparable American article, Senators rush in here and say, "We have made out our case. We have shown that an article which cost only 30 or 40 cents, or, we will say, a dollar, has been sold at retail for $15."

Mr. President, before I get through I am going to show an American product in common use in this country which sells at retail everywhere for $5, but is sold at wholesale for 19 cents.

They exhibited Apollinaris water, cabbage seed, leather belts, toothbrushes, amber beads, bird cages, hair dye, a foot rule, padlocks, and a monkey.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I have been informed that among the interesting things they yet have to bring on in this circus is a roulette wheel. They seem to think that is one of the necessary household utensils. They also have in the room below the statue of a lady minus her clothes, and a bottle of prunes. I do not know who is to be ringmaster when that particular circus is brought in, but how appropriate it was that the first circus opened with a cuckoo. That is a bird which lays its eggs in some other bird's nest, and how appropriate it is to open a tariff discussion with a cuckoo. The next opened with a monkey. If they want to slander their ancestors by auctioning him off, I suppose they have a right to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Where was the organ grinder?

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Indiana was the organ grinder. I am sorry he is not present, but unless there is some organ for him to grind he never is here.

It strikes me, if I may interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, that it is appropriate for a party which has become so absolutely helpless that the papers of its own faith are denouncing it for its incompetency to open a show here in the Senate with a cuckoo and conclude it with a monkey. They are so typical, so entirely typical, of the capacity and the performances of the party. I am sure that the people who elected them will appreciate that they have run true to form.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, is it not a little strange that as to all of these little toy articles which were brought here, none of them except the tablecloth, the napkins, and the gun are of common use among the people? If they are, they are items of trifling consequence, and it is upon such articles as that, as we all know, that these profiteers make their greatest exactions. That is a matter of common knowledge. They selected a lot of articles upon which there is always profiteering, because the people have no knowledge of the cost of these little things, and therefore the retailer can take advantage of them, and the retailers and the drug stores—I do not mean all of them, but a part of them—from time immemorial have been in the habit of figuring very much greater percentage of profits in fixing the retail prices of these little articles of the character the Senators on the other side have brought into the Senate than they figure upon more important articles.

It was not necessary for these gentlemen to bring these articles in and exhibit them. They can be described without exhibition. For the purpose of making this argument and this comparison, why did they not select some of the essential and staple things of life, things about which the people are supposed to have knowledge of the original cost and the ultimate cost to the consumer, and are therefore able, by reason of having some degree of familiarity with both prices, to make a comparison for themselves?

If they were not going to do that, they owed it to the Senate, as I said a little while ago, at least to furnish us a statement of the facts with reference to the commercial transactions in these articles which they exhibit, or use for illustration, which information is essential to enable us and the country to determine whether the importer or the department store is profiteering any more in connection with the foreign article than with reference to the domestic article, so that we might be able to determine whether the importer is any more of a criminal than any other American retail or wholesale merchant.

The Senator from Indiana, selecting an article sold by McCutcheon, of New York, claimed that McCutcheon had declared that if the duty on linen were doubled—raised, I think, from 30 to 60 per cent—the retail price of linen towels would probably be advanced by reason of that increase from $6 a dozen to $7 a dozen; and the Senator said that advance was not justified by the increase in the rate. It may not be altogether justified by the increase in the rate, but it is very nearly justified by the increase in the rate. The foreign selling price, according to the Senator, was three dollars and eighty-odd cents, I think. Adding 30 per cent to that would increase it a dollar. But suppose the duty did not cover the advance in the price this great mercantile house anticipated might occur and would occur; does that prove that that department store is profiteering with respect to this particular article?

Does the Senator know whether he paid more or less for his napkins than the invoice price? I think it was just one sale. I do not know when that sale was made. Does he know whether McCutcheon made the sale out of the present stock, probably as the result of recent purchases, and paid only that amount or paid more than the foreign landed price which he gave? I think he does not. I think he probably would find that the foreign prices have increased very much in recent months.

But leaving all that out, assuming that they have not increased, assuming that the advance in prices is greater than the duty would justify, what does that prove? It proves the charge that has for long, long years been made against a high protective rate, a charge that actual experience has borne out. Put a duty upon almost any product that is imported in large quantities and the price of the American product will at once respond, and in many instances, instead of adding simply the full amount of the duty, they will use that duty as an excuse to advance the price far more than the amount of the duty. That is a matter of common knowledge and common experience. Part of the advance is justified and part of the advance is not justified. That is one of the tricks of trade, Mr. President. I do not say that of all, but in many instances. Wherever a good excuse is given for an advance of a certain amount, that excuse will be availed of for the purpose of making an advance to a far greater amount, especially where, as in the case of the tariff, the consumer who is victimized has no opportunity or means of ascertaining whether he has been mulcted only to the extent of the tariff or has been mulcted far beyond the tariff.

Of course, Mr. McCutcheon is going to sell that merchandise in competition with other merchants. Mr. McCutcheon has got to charge at retail for his products practically the same as the other merchants charge.

If the spread was too great for the duty, and I do not think it was much too great, he presumed upon the very fact that sometimes, more often than otherwise, more is added than the tariff duties would justify.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has been discussing the duties on linen. I do not care to interrupt him now if he does not desire an interruption——

Mr. SIMMONS. I would very much prefer that the Senator would allow me to proceed.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall do so, of course. I have a letter bearing upon that subject from the proprietor of a large hotel.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be glad if the Senator would put it in the RECORD after I shall have concluded my speech.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not want to take too much of the time of the Senate. I have not had an army of appraisers at my command to send out to get me exceptional and freak articles which do not represent anything of consequence to the trade life of America in the requirements of the people and are but a small item in connection with their living expenses, items the price of which at retail ordinarily are not at all in harmony with ordinary prices obtaining as to staple products and representative products. I have not had any appraisers to do that for me. I have not scoured the country to get some illustrations here of prices that so shock the common sense that everybody recognizes that they are not real transactions.

The Senator spoke about the gun which he displayed. That gun sold for a dollar. Think of it, Mr. President. A fairly good stock, a fairly good barrel, that gun could be manufactured and sold for $1 in Germany, but when it comes over here the gullible American purchaser has no more common sense than to pay $15 for the worthless thing. This sort of spread in prices as to these freakish articles needs no answer, because the common sense of mankind answers and says they are not representative articles, and a great party should not descend to the level of seeking to palm them off as representative. They will not succeed in doing that, because the American people are intelligent, and I do not think any Senators are being deceived unless they want to be.

Now, Mr. President, we have heard a great deal about watches. While I have nobody to search out anything for me, I am beginning to receive articles from people who feel that a fraud is being practiced on the American people and an unwarranted assault made upon the very sources of our information. I have here in my hand two watches. They are exactly alike. They are of the same commercial value. One of them was made in Germany and the other was made in this country. We saw a watch here the other day that was sold, according to the statement of the Senator who presented it, for something around a dollar, maybe a little less than a dollar; that is, the foreign-landed cost was about a dollar and it sold in the American market, as alleged, for some outrageous price, I have forgotten what, but perhaps $8 or $10. Here are these two watches. I am going to read what the man said who sent these watches to me as to each of them.

This communication is from Mr. Edward J. Gall, of Paul Forbriger & Co., of New York. He sends me this letter in connection with the watches:

NEW YORK CITY, June 7, 1922.

The Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As we see from the press the active interest you are taking in all matters of the tariff, permit us to point out to you a specific instance in which the proposed rates are excessive.

We are inclosing duplicates of invoices showing that we sell an imported watch at 65 cents and 67½ cents. Our price to the jobbing trade on this imported watch is 72½ cents, and in larger quantities 67½ cents. On only two occasions have we sold it at 65 cents, and then to meet domestic competition. A watch similar to this foreign product, made in this country, is sold as low as 60 cents.

The proposed new tariff on watches imposes a duty of 75 cents on all watches having less than seven jewels, and this covers both men's watches and ladies' watches. We question whether the intention was to make this duty apply to the so-called "clock" watches, a cheap form of construction, differing entirely from that of the ladies' watches, which are imported in 1 jewel, 3, 5, and 6 jewels. If a duty of 75 cents apiece is imposed on the cheap "clock" watches, to which we are referring, the duty itself would be greater than the selling price of the American watch, which is evidently unwarranted. So-called "clock" watches are largely used by workmen and boys, and it does not seem reasonable to force them to pay very much higher prices by a measure which collects, in the form of specific duty, the total selling value of the American product.

Respectfully yours,

PAUL FORBRIGER & CO.,
Per EDWARD J. GALL.

Now, then, Mr. President, I have another letter from him a little later on in response to a letter which I wrote him, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, June 13, 1922.

The Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As requested in yours of June 10, we have sent you a sample of the American watch manufactured by the E. Ingraham Co., Bristol, Conn.—

There is the place to go, Mr. President, if you want to find cheap products. They only become very costly, these Connecticut products, when they want tariff protection—and sold under the trade-mark name of "Viceroy," also a sample of the German watch that we have been importing. Both of these watches are of equal value in the wholesale as well as retail trade.

The American watch also has the advantage of having an indestructible crystal over the dial and not an ordinary glass crystal that is easily broken.

We attach the original paid bill, dated March 7, for the American watch, showing a price of 65 cents at that time. Since then the prices have been reduced again and they are now being sold to the wholesalers by the manufacturer at 60 cents each.

We also attach a page from the trade paper of the Jewelers' Circular of April 26, showing an advertisement by a wholesale distributor in New York—not a manufacturer—offering American guaranteed watches at 70 cents apiece.

We hope that these facts will be of good service to you, and it shows plainly that a duty of 75 cents apiece on cheap watches will absolutely eliminate the further importation thereof. We also trust that you will endeavor to have the duty rate on low-priced watches altered, so that it will still be possible to import them and compete with American watches that are being sold at 60 cents each.

Respectfully,

PAUL FORBRIGER & CO.,
Per EDWARD J. GALL.

This [exhibiting] is the American watch and here is the bill of sale:

One hundred and eighty-nine pieces No. 201 Umpire watches, at 65 cents, $122.86.
Order No. 4203.
This is to certify that the above is a correct and true copy of its original.

PAUL FORBRIGER & CO.
E. J. GALL.

Sworn to before me this 13th day of May, 1922.
[SEAL.] JOHN F. VALENT,
Notary Public, New York County.

That is sworn to by Mr. Gall, who sends me these papers. That is the imported watch. The invoice for the American watch is not sworn to, but on the margin is printed "Paid, April 28, 1922."

That is the reason, Mr. President, I wanted the Senator from North Dakota to bring comparable articles. These are two comparable articles—they are practically identical articles; one is produced in Germany and the other produced here; the transactions are both recent, and the watches sell in the American market at the same price.

Mr. OVERMAN. For what do they sell at retail?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know for what they sell at retail. I am giving only the wholesale price. The Senator from North Dakota referred to watches which he said came from Germany which sold for a dollar there, but which he said retailed at eight or ten dollars. I do not know at what price these watches retail, but I know that this German watch and this American watch are sold at wholesale by these parties at the same price. At what price they are sold retail I do not know; they may retail at $5, $10, or $20; there may be a spread between these prices and the retail prices as big as the spread which the Senator from North Dakota disclosed the other day with reference to the watch which he exhibited.

I should not be at all surprised if that were true, because everybody knows that there is astounding, almost unbelievable, profiteering going on in this country on the part of many retailers. I believe by a little search I could find a hundred cases right here in Washington where the retail price is 1,000 or 1,500 per cent higher than the price received by the original producer or manufacturer. That has nothing to do with the tariff; but that fact acquits the importer, for it shows that the American seller of the American product is charging equally high prices.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I desire to observe that, as I recall, my colleague, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], has on more than one occasion referred to the enormous profits which were being made by the retailers in the United States. The charge has been made that they were profiteering; and I have no doubt that, as to many articles which are manufactured in the United States and sold by the manufacturers for a low price when they finally reach the ultimate purchaser the spread is several hundred per cent, and, in some instances, more than 1,000 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to state to the Senator from Utah that a Senator who is a member of the majority of the Finance Committee of the Senate stated to me to-day that he had occasion to buy a certain article of medicine very frequently, and that the retail price was so high he concluded that he would investigate and ascertain the first cost of the elements that entered into that medicine; that he made his investigation, and that he found that the actual cost was only 11 cents; and yet he had to pay, month after month—for he used the article frequently—$2.68, as I remember, for that medicine, which cost to produce but 11 cents.

I say that in connection with this bill we have nothing to do with retail prices, and any man who knows the A, B, C's of the tariff knows that retail prices have nothing to do with it. Senators may make an argument as to prices in connection with the tariff, but they know as well as I know that the only sensible comparison under the theory of their bill is between the landed cost plus the duty and the American manufacturer's cost, not the wholesaler's cost, because if we are going to take the wholesaler's cost we have got to add the importer's profit on the foreign article, for the wholesaler's profit is added to the American manufactured article. We have either got to consider the difference between the price of the imported article, without the duty, and the price of the American manufactured article, or the difference between the price for which the importer sells his article, with the duty added, and his profit added, and the price for which the American wholesaler sells the American article with his profit added.

The use of any other figures for any incidental purposes, if there be the slightest attempt to connect them with the tariff, is a dishonest argument and one that should not be given any consideration whatsoever.

Mr. President, I have here a very remarkable letter that I received the other day, and also a safety razor. It is suggested to me that if I thought it was not a good razor I could try it. It is being extensively sold as an American product. This letter to me is a copy of a letter that the writer says he sent to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on June 15, 1922, but it is mighty certain that the Senator from North Dakota has never presented this letter to the Senate. He certainly did not present it the other day in connection with his argument on razors. He says:

F. E. LONAS,
53 Washington Square, New York, June 15, 1922.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find copy of my letter of this date to Hon. PORTER J. MCCUMBER, United States Senator from North Dakota, on the subject of razors. I think you may find this information of interest, and in case the Senator from North Dakota should not feel disposed to enlighten the Senate on this subject—

And he has not, Mr. President—perhaps you may like to do so, and you are at liberty to use this letter for that purpose if you so desire.

I am now going to read a copy of the letter that this gentleman, who is Mr. F. E. Lonas, wrote to the Senator from North Dakota:

F. E. LONAS,
53 Washington Square, New York, June 15, 1922.

Hon. PORTER J. MCCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was much interested in reading in the New York Times of this morning of your efforts to enlighten the Senate and the people of the United States on the subject of profiteering in various imported articles. I noted with regret, however, that you were unable to supply any information as to the cost and selling price of competing articles made in this country—

He has struck the vitals of this whole controversy—and feeling sure you would be glad to have this information to submit to the Senate and the public at large, I am writing to give you some specific information with reference to one of the articles in question, viz, razors. I note that you exhibited a razor which you stated cost 21 cents abroad. I happened a few months ago to be in the office of an acquaintance connected with a very large manufacturing concern in this city and he had on his desk at the time the various parts of a Gillette safety razor. I asked him what he was doing with it in his office, and he replied that they had been asked to figure on a large order. I asked if they had secured the order, and he replied that they had not, as some other manufacturer had submitted a lower bid. I then asked what price he had submitted, and he replied, 19 cents for supplying all the material and doing all of the work necessary to make a complete razor. This, of course, included profit to his firm in the price submitted. You doubtless know that some millions of these razors—

These Gillette razors offered in large quantities by this manufacturer, who was unable to sell because another manufacturer in this country underbid him—

You doubtless know that some millions of these razors are sold annually in the United States at a retail price of $5 each.

I have no doubt that you will be glad to have this information, which I can assure you is absolutely correct, and that you will be glad to impart it to the Senate in due course. As I observed from the press report Senator SIMMONS desired this information, I am sending him a copy of this letter in the same mail as the original to you.

Mr. KING. That would be several hundred per cent profit, over a thousand per cent profit, would it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should say so, though I have not calculated it. We do not know what that underbidding manufacturer's price was, but the price of this manufacturer was 19 cents, and he lost the order because another American manufacturer underbid him. I assume that the other bid was at most not higher than 18 cents.

Mr. President, I have here [exhibiting] a knife. A German knife was exhibited here the other day by the Senator from North Dakota. The size of that German knife was just about the same as this. This knife has a gold-plated handle; that is to say, it claims to have been dipped in gold. I think the dip must have been mighty thin, but it looks just as good as gold. The ordinary man who is not skilled in matters of that kind might buy that knife for a gold-handled knife. That is an American-made knife. It has two nice blades to it, good springs, and is, I think, a better knife than the German knife which the Senator from North Dakota exhibited here the other day, which he said was bought by the importer for 5, 8, 9, or 10 cents—I do not recall exactly the alleged price to the importer—and sold for a price—oh, I do not remember, Mr. President, but way up in the dollars; $7 I think.

I have here the letter accompanying this knife. The letter reads:

> Usually you would not wish to know the price of a gift, but in this case it will give added interest to know that it was made in an American factory and sold at a profit, in quantities, at 9.374 cents each.

About 9.4 cents.

Mr. POMERENE. They were sold wholesale for that price?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they were sold for that price at a profit in quantities by the American factory. Nine and four-tenths cents is the factory price. If I am asked for what it retails I can not tell; but if the 9-cent or 10-cent knife which the Senator from North Dakota showed the other day retailed for $7, perhaps this knife retails at an equally high price. It seems ridiculous to think that anybody is fool enough in this country to give $7 for a knife of that kind; $7 is more than is given for almost any pocketknife, but if the German knife exhibited by the Senator from North Dakota retails for that much I should say it would be easier to palm off this American gold-handled knife for $7 on an unsuspecting and credulous purchaser than the knife which the Senator from North Dakota exhibited.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the date of the invoice from which the Senator quoted?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not read an invoice, but I will give the date of the letter which I read. The letter is dated June 17, 1922, and the knife was sent to me by Mr. H. E. Miles, president of the Fair Tariff League. He adds:

> If it was made in a German factory and imported at this price—> the duty would be 12 cents per knife plus 60 per cent, making the duty 18.6 cents, or 200 per cent.
> Nine cents—
> Double the cost of the knife——

Mr. POMERENE. When it may be sold at a profit at a little over 9 cents?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the Senator tell us where that knife was made?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know, but I will read further from the letter:

> I have the same gold knife, of decidedly poorer quality, from another Connecticut factory, at 7 cents each, and this poorer quality, with one blade only, at 5.2 cents each. If imported, the duty on this would be 15½ cents each, or 300 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. Can the Senator tell us what factory in Connecticut manufactures the knife?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but I can give the Senator the name of the gentleman who wrote me the letter. The letter is written by Mr. H. E. Miles, who is the chairman of the Fair Tariff League, a moderate protection organization, which claims to have 1,500,000 members in this country.

Mr. McLEAN. I am acquainted with Mr. Miles and his views on the question of protection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am, too; and I think he is a protectionist; although, of course, the Senator from Connecticut is in favor of so much higher protection that he does not think Mr. Miles is a protectionist at all.

Mr. McLEAN. That is for the Senator from North Carolina to say. Does the Senator know what the profit is on that knife?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I know nothing except the facts that I have given.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Miles says it is sold at a profit. Does the Senator know at what profit?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I can not tell the Senator at what profit it is sold; but Mr. Miles states that it is sold by the manufacturer, the producer, at a profit, and he also says—I do not know whether the Senator from Connecticut has any information about that or not—that he has a knife made in a Connecticut factory which sells for 7 cents each, one of a little poorer quality, with only one blade, which sells for 5 cents each. That is what Mr. Miles says.

Mr. McLEAN. It is too bad he did not send it on when he sent the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. He sent the other.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Connecticut deny it?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Connecticut denies that there is such a knife as that made in Connecticut—that is, the Senator's own State—and if Mr. Miles is wrong, if there is no such knife made in his State at that price, the Senator can find that out very quickly.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know anything about it; but I doubt it very much.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am giving what Mr. Miles says, and I am sure he is an honorable gentleman. I know enough about him to say that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question, in view of certain questions which have been asked here?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has served on the Finance Committee during the time that the hearings were held. To what extent did the committee try to find out the factory cost of the various articles about which testimony was given?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there was a great deal of testimony, but I think there was very little testimony that was directed to ascertaining the factory costs of any of the products upon which duties are imposed in the tariff bill. It was usually stated by the majority that in the present conditions it would be impracticable to get that information, and no effort was made to get it. The testimony, if the Senator will read it, is directed principally to showing that the wages paid the German laborer were less than the wages paid the American laborer.

Mr. POMERENE. That is usually the way with many of these investigations. Will the Senator pardon me for just a minute?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I have in mind a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee a good many years ago in which the secretary of an association of manufacturers was called before the committee, and this secretary said that the men engaged in his line of industry were not making anything. A member of the Ways and Means Committee referred to a certain company of which I had personal knowledge—I am not guessing about this—and asked the secretary of the association whether that company had made anything. It so happened that the proprietors of this company were related to the member of the Ways and Means Committee, and the secretary replied: "I am sure they have made nothing during the past year." It was common knowledge in Ohio that that company that year had made a very large cash dividend, and, in addition thereto, a 100 per cent stock dividend.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator will find that that was a fair illustration of a good many things that happened in connection with the hearings upon this bill; but let me go on, Mr. President. I shall detain the Senate only a very few minutes longer.

While I am referring to Mr. Miles, I want to read a little bit about these prices.

Here is an article that appeared in the Daily News Record, of New York, written by Mr. Miles. That, I understand, is either a Republican paper or an independent paper with strong Republican leanings. It publishes some statements contained in a letter written by Mr. Miles, the gentleman from whom I have just quoted. I shall read a part of it. The part I shall read is headed:

IGNORANT OF CONDITIONS.

> Our Senators must be ignorant of manufacturing conditions. This does not excuse them.

Now he refers to this knife:

> I have a gold-handled, two-bladed penknife. The American factory price, 9.4 cents; Senate duty, 18.6 cents, or 200 per cent—the covering real gold, handsome—you can guess how thin. A poorer quality, 5.2 cents.
> The ordinary new-style fluted bread knife, 10-inch blade, American make, 6.5 cents. Duty, 14 cents, or 215 per cent.

Butcher knife, 8-inch blade, 8.3 cents. Duty, 14.5 cents, or 174 per cent.

Paring knife, high-carbon superior steel, 2.7 cents. Duty, 4.6 cents, or 170 per cent. Common kitchen table knife, 4.5 cents. Duty, 12.5 cents, or 277 per cent.

"Kindergarten" scissors, round ends for safety, used mostly in schools, pre-war, 2.25 cents, now 5 cents. Duty, 7.25 cents, or 134 per cent.

American safety razor with blade, shaving as well as Gillette, 5 cents. Duty, 175 per cent.

Of all American table cutlery made in the last three years 48 per cent has been exported.

Think about that, Mr. President, when we are being told that German cutlery is flooding this market to such an extent that it is endangering the domestic industry and driving the manufacturer out of business, in connection with the actual fact that after producing all that the American market will take of these products we export to the outside world, and sell at a fair price, 48 per cent in competition with Germany!

Common gingham for kitchen aprons and cheap dresses made cheaper here than anywhere—

And it is. I live in a country of cotton factories. It is, Mr. President.

Imports impossible—

True.

Freely exported—

Absolutely certain—

present duty 15 per cent, Senate 39.2 per cent. The principal manufacturers showed capital in 1896 $4,000,000, now $44,500,000, and $30,000,000 cash dividends also declared. It is reducing labor, while Congress increases its tariff 275 per cent.

* * * * * * *

I have an excellent silk fabric from a Connecticut mill, now sold in free-trade England at good profit.

Think about that, Mr. President. It is desired now to increase the present duties on silks up to 70 per cent, and on plushes made out of silk up to 90 per cent, and here is an excellent silk fabric from a Connecticut mill now sold in free-trade England at a good profit, and yet Senators insult the people's intelligence by contending that we can not compete with England right here in this country with a tariff of less than 70 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, has the Senator the name of the mill and the price?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am reading from a newspaper article, and it does not give the name of the mill.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I guess not.

Mr. SIMMONS. It simply says "a Connecticut mill."

Proposed duty 62 per cent, permitting our manufacturers, now badly overprotected, to add $60,000,000 to their prices, which amount would be doubled at retail against consumers. Wages are 15.7 per cent of the factory selling prices, or one-fourth of the proposed duty, which pretends to be principally for the wage earners.

Aluminum ware, chinaware, glassware, pots, and kettles, and almost everything else is like this.

Even common salt—

Mr. President, I remember a time when the people of this country almost rose up in arms against the suggestion of putting a duty on common salt—

Even common salt, of which we have several deposits, each about 600 miles long by 50 to 200 miles wide and sometimes 200 feet deep, is to be given 44 per cent duty in bulk and over 70 per cent in bags.

I beg the pardon of the Senate for taking up so much time, but I thought it very well to put some of these matters into the RECORD. I have a great deal of additional matter along this same line, but I could not get it segregated in time to use it this afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the tariff bill be temporarily laid aside and that the conference report on the War Department appropriations bill be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 18½, 40, 43, 58, 66, 67, 68, 72, 73, 84, 91, 92, 98, 110, 113, 121, 128, 137, 138, 142, 143, 144, 181, 194, 195, 201, 210, 213, 215, 233, 237, 238, and 239.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 12, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 32, 42, 44, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 56, 59, 62, 63, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 88, 90, 93, 95, 97, 99, 100, 104, 105, 107, 108, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 123, 125, 126, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 139, 140, 141, 145, 147, 148, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 169, 169½, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 192, 193, 202, 206, 207, 209, 211, 212, 217, 219, 223, 226, 227, and 228; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$162,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$119,270"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$115,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$30,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$60,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows:

"For expenses incident to completion of the work of furnishing to adjutants general of States and the District of Columbia statements of service of all persons from those States and the District of Columbia who entered the military service during the war with Germany, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, $230,000, to be immediately available."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "six"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$53,020"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Pay of officers: For pay of officers of the line and staff, $33,890,771: Provided, That after January 1, 1923, the sum herein appropriated for the pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 12,000 commissioned officers on the active list of the Regular Army and the emergency officers in service undergoing physical reconstruction: Provided further, That on and after January 1, 1923, there shall be officers as now authorized by law except that there shall be 420 colonels, 577 lieutenant colonels, 1,575 majors, 3,150 captains, 2,067 first lieutenants, and 1,771 second lieutenants, and these numbers shall not be exceeded except as hereinafter provided; 983 officers of the Medical Corps, 158 officers of the Dental Corps, 126 officers of the Veterinary Corps, 72 officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 125 chaplains; and the numbers herein provided shall include the officers of Philippine Scouts who shall continue to be carried on the promotion list and who shall be promoted to grades from first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, in the same manner as prescribed by law for other officers on the promotion list: Provided further, That prior to January 1, 1923, there shall be no promotions to grades below brigadier general of officers of the Regular Army except of officers of the Medical Department and chaplains, and vacancies now existing in any grade below brigadier general not actually filled by the acceptance of an appointment tendered prior to the date of approval of this act shall not be filled, and beginning January 1, 1923, there shall be no promotions or appointments to any grade or to the branches of the Medical Department or chaplains that would cause the numbers herein authorized for such grade or branch to be exceeded, except that the colonels, exclusive of those in the Medical Department and professors, remaining on the active list on January 1, 1923, and not included in the 420 junior colonels on that date shall be carried as additional numbers so long as they remain in that grade and shall not prevent promotions due to vacancies occurring among the 420 authorized colonels: Provided further, That officers in excess of the numbers authorized herein and not removed from the active list by other means shall be disposed of as follows: Those of the Medical Department and chaplains shall, prior to January 1, 1923, be eliminated from the active list as hereinafter provided; those other than of the Medical Department and chaplains shall, prior to January 1, 1923, be eliminated from the active list as hereinafter provided except that not more than a total of 800 now in grades from colonel to first lieutenant, inclusive, shall either be continued as additional officers in their grades until absorbed, or those in grades below lieutenant colonel shall, in inverse order of standing on the promotion list beginning with the lowest on the list in each grade, be discharged and recommissioned in the next lower grade prior to January 1, 1923, and officers accepting recommission in a lower grade shall be carried on the promotion list in the positions they now occupy and shall, while serving in such lower grade, take rank among the officers of the Regular Army in accordance with their length of service notwithstanding the date of their new commission; and any officer shall be eligible for recommission and service in the branch in which now commissioned; officers selected for elimination of less than 10 years' commissioned service may, upon recommendation of the board herein provided for, be discharged with one year's pay; or those of more than 10 years' and less than 20 years' commissioned service may, upon recommendation of the board, be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service; or those of more than 20 years' commissioned service may, upon recommenadtion of the board, be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent: Provided further, That, of the 800 or less officers to be absorbed or recommissioned under the preceding proviso, a suitable number of officers in grades from colonel to first lieutenant, inclusive, shall be continued as additional until absorbed and a suitable number in each grade from major to first lieutenant shall be recommissioned in the next lower grade, such suitable numbers to be determined by the President upon the recommendation of the board of general officers hereinafter provided for: Provided further, That commissioned service for the purposes of this act shall include only active commissioned service in the Army performed when under appointment from the United States Government whether in the Regular, provisional, or temporary forces: Provided further, That any officer of less than 10 years' commissioned service but of more than 20 years' service accredited toward retirement or for increased pay for length of service may, in lieu of discharge with one year's pay as hereinbefore provided, if he so elects, be appointed a warrant officer and carried as an additional number in that grade; or he may, if he so elects, be retired with the rank of warrant officer with pay at the rate of 2 per cent of the pay of a warrant officer multiplied by the number of years of such accredited service: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall convene a board of five general officers which may include retired officers, whose call to active duty for this purpose is hereby authorized, which board, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall recommend to the President the officers to be eliminated from the active list under the provisions of this act, the number of officers in various grades to be recommissioned in the next lower grade as hereinbefore provided, and the number of officers in various grades to be continued as additional until absorbed as hereinbefore provided: Provided further, That officers shall be assigned to the several branches of the Army so that the number assigned to any branch, except of the Medical Department and chaplains, shall be 70 per cent of the number prescribed for such branch under the act of June 4, 1920, but the President may increase or diminish the number of officers assigned to any branch by not more than a total of 30 per cent."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on Senate amendments numbered 41, 65, 106, 131, 199, 214, 220, 221, 225, and 230.

J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
W. L. JONES,
SELDEN P. SPENCER,
WM. J. HARRIS,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
WILLIAM H. STAFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the report, of course, is exceedingly lengthy, and it would take the Secretary considerable time to read it, so I shall make merely a brief statement.

The conferees have come to a complete agreement. With respect to nine items the agreement is informal, because it is impossible under the rules of the House for a formal agreement to be reached upon those nine items. Upon those nine items, however, the House conferees will request the concurrence of the House, so that in effect we are reporting a complete agreement.

May I say, very briefly, that under this agreement the enlisted strength of the Regular Army is to be fixed at a maximum of 125,000 men for the next fiscal year, and the commissioned strength is to be fixed at a maximum of 12,000 men for the next fiscal year? In this respect the Senate has yielded 8,000 enlisted men and 1,000 officers from its original proposal.

The report also would involve an aggregate appropriation of something like $15,000,000 less than the bill as passed by the Senate. It is impossible to give the Senate an absolutely accurate figure concerning that reduction, because two or three of the items which are technically in disagreement can not be included in the computation until the House acts upon them, but, generally speaking, this report carries an aggregate of appropriations something like fifteen or sixteen million dollars less than the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator state what other important matters of disagreement there were, and what conclusions were reached respecting those matters of disagreement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The only one of any importance in disagreement technically is the appropriation of $7,500,000 for continuing the building of Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals. That is reported in disagreement. We are given to understand, however, that the House conferees do not object to it, but, under their system of rules, and their general understanding with their colleagues of the House, they felt it to be their duty to bring that back to the House for a separate vote, and the only way to bring it back for a separate vote is to report a disagreement.

The others are exceedingly slight in importance. For example, there is one amendment providing that the appropriation for pay of the Army shall be administered as and shall constitute one fund, with a certain limiting proviso that the funds shall not be used in any such way as to pay more persons in the Army than the specific appropriation provides for.

Another one is a small matter, authorizing the Air Service to enter into the same kind of contracts in the purchase of supplies as the Quartermaster's Department, the Signal Corps, and the Engineers now use.

The other is an amendment allowing all the items under the head "Pay of the Military Academy" to be administered as and to constitute one fund. In the item "Pay of the Military Academy," each and every man paid is listed in the bill, and his salary is fixed. Every salary is fixed by statute, and the statute controls the number absolutely. So the Senate proposed that that shall be administered as one fund and thus save a vast amount of bookkeeping here in Washington. The House conferees, believing that that is legislation, under the House rules, are going to take it back and ask the House to concur.

There is another item of very minor importance. Under the existing law, when men of the Army die outside of the United States or on Army transports, the Government pays for the transportation of the bodies to be brought home. We insert in the bill a provision that the same shall apply to Army nurses who die under similar circumstances.

The Medical and Surgical History of the War is now being prepared under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army. We want that done under a separate appropriation, and in order to have that done the Senate conferees yield and concur in the House proposal that it shall be done under a separate appropriation, rather than to take it out of the general appropriation for the support and maintenanace of hospitals.

Then there is another amendment. To-day the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers receives part of its maintenance fund from the Veterans' Bureau and the rest of its maintenance fund by a direct appropriation carried in this bill. The conferees of both Houses believe that that is an exceedingly unbusinesslike method; that the soldiers' homes should be supported by specific appropriations sufficient to maintain them in their entirety, and that no lump sum should be handed over by the Veterans' Bureau to the soldiers' homes. We can not cure the situation for the coming fiscal year, because the Budget estimates were prepared upon that basis, but we desire to have inserted in the bill a provision that for the fiscal year 1924, and thereafter, the Veterans' Bureau funds shall not be handed over to the soldiers' homes for the support, or partial support, of those homes.

Mr. KING. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is unanimous on the part of the Senate, one conferee on the part of the House not signing the report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word about one of the Senate amendments that was not agreed to in conference.

The Senate put upon the Army bill an appropriation of $1,500,000 to replace the Alaskan cable. A measure for that purpose has passed the Senate twice. The Senate has gone into it very carefully, and the committee considered the need of replacing that cable as very imperative, and the Senate ratified the view of the committee.

I fear that our failure to have this item agreed to will be very bad, if not calamitous. The House conferees, however, apparently had not gone into the matter very fully and carefully, and so they would not yield upon it. It was the last amendment disposed of in the conference.

As I said, the Senate conferees receded. I regret very much that we did so, but I think I violate no confidence when I say that the members of the conference on the part of the House individually assured the Senate conferees that in the preparation of the military appropriation bill next winter they would look into the matter very carefully, and, if the need appeared to be imperative, as we tried to show them, they felt satisfied that the bill would take care of it—that is, if they were convinced of the need of it, they would use their influence, at any rate, to have the appropriation made immediately available. I feel that in the next bill the matter will be taken care of and the appropriation provided. So I consented to the recession from that item.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think it is my duty to the Senate to mention the two remaining technical disagreements. They are not important, but perhaps they should be stated for the RECORD.

The House appropriated something like $4,000,000 for longevity pay for enlisted men of the Army. The Senate appropriated a smaller amount, due to the reduction of that item by the new pay law. When we got into conference, we found that we required even less than the Senate amendment provided for, but as conferees are required to stay within the limits of the House and Senate provisions on such items, we must ask the House to take an even lower sum than the Senate provided, which is lower than the House item.

The other amendment is with respect to the quarters which are to be built at Fort Benning. The Senate provided that the money for that purpose could be used for the building of apartment houses, not to cost in excess of $150,000, and to house 18 families. The Senate passed it in that form. The House conferees desired to accept that limitation upon the appropriation, but it is necessary, under their rules, to take it back to the House, because under their rule it is legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PRICES OF CRUDE OIL AND GASOLINE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the supply of copies of Senate Resolution 295 has been exhausted in the files of the document room. The Committee on Manufactures requires copies for the use of the committee to send out to certain oil companies. I ask unanimous consent that an order be entered for a reprint of 1,000 copies for the use of the document room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that 1,000 copies of Senate Resolution 295 be reprinted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MILITARY ROAD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. While the tariff bill is temporarily laid aside, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3345) changing the name of Keokuk Street, in the county of Washington, D. C., to Military Road. The change of name is desired by those living on both sides of the street. A part of it is called Military Road and a part Keokuk Street, so that it causes a great deal of confusion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will it lead to discussion?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It will lead to no discussion.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the name of the street known as Keokuk Street NW., extending from Military Road at Twenty-seventh Street to Wisconsin Avenue, be, and the same shall henceforth be, known as Military Road. And the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to cause the name of Military Road from Military Road at Twenty-seventh Street to Wisconsin Avenue NW. to be placed upon the plats and maps of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. MOSES presented a resolution adopted by the Colebrook Woman's Club, of Colebrook, N. H., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That we protest against the food, tableware, and women's-wear schedules of the Fordney-McCumber bill. These schedules will increase the costs of living in every American home. They are fines levied by American men upon American women and upon American children. They should not be allowed to become law.

Mr. MOSES presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held on Sunday, June 18, 1922, of citizens of Manchester, N. H., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas four years after the Great War the systematic extermination of the Christians of Asia Minor is still being pursued by the Turkish Government of Angora with unabated ruthlessness, which will result in the virtual extinction of the Armenian and Greek populations of Anatolia; and

Whereas the latest decisions of the Allied Governments propose to hand back to Turkey another million of Christians but recently delivered from Turkish oppression: Be it hereby

Resolved, That this meeting protest to the civilized world against the commission of such an abominable outrage and extend its heartfelt sympathy to the Christians of the Near East who are thus threatened with complete extermination, and pledge to them its unstinted material and moral support in their strenuous resistance to the return of Turkish tyranny; be it further

Resolved, That this meeting express the conviction that the continued presence of the Greek Army in Asia Minor is the most efficacious guaranty for the safety of the Christians and other non-Turkish minorities; and be it finally

Resolved, That this meeting express its grateful appreciation of the efforts of the British Government and the later decision of the United States Government to bring the Turkish horrors to the knowledge of the civilized world.

ENFORCEMENT OF CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to detail four persons paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 780) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3734) for the relief of Benjamin F. Burch; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 3735) to amend an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, by amending section 10 thereof; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3736) granting a pension to Clarence G. Stonestreet; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3737) to correct the military record of Clarence G. Stonestreet; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 214) to authorize the expenses for delegates to the Pan-Pacific Union; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TARIFF BILL AMENDMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7456, the tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES TO THE REPARATION COMMISSION.

Mr. KING. I submit a resolution and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It calls for certain information. I am informed that those pretending to represent the United States, or actually representing it, officially or unofficially, on the Reparation Commission are being paid for their services by Germany or amounts coming from Germany. I want to secure full information in regard to that matter, the number of employees and the amount paid to each, and whether any officials are officers; and if so, whether they are drawing double compensation.

The resolution (S. Res. 309) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to report to the Senate the names of any official or so-called "unofficial" representatives of the State Department accredited to the Reparation Commission, or presuming to act for the United States in dealing with the Reparation Commission, together with a statement of the instructions under which said persons may be acting or pretending to act for the Government of the United States, and also a statement of the salaries and allowances made to said persons and by whom paid, and further as to whether or not officers of the Army have been attached to said Reparation Commission or have been delegated by the State Department to represent the Government in dealing with the Reparation Commission, and whether or not such officers have been permitted to receive or have received salaries and allowances from the Reparation Commission in addition to their pay and allowances as officers of the Army; and also a statement of the number of clerks, stenographers, and persons employed by said representatives of the State Department, together with the compensation paid to each.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On June 17, 1922:

S. 2664. An act for the relief of Jesse Goodin;

S. 2666. An act for the relief of Ed Thomas and Pauline Thomas; and

S. J. Res. 204. Joint resolution to authorize the loan by the Secretary of War to the commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans of cots for the use of the members of the United Confederate Veterans during the sessions of the national encampment of the United Confederate Veterans at Richmond, Va., from June 19 to 22, 1922.

On June 19, 1922:

S. J. Res. 7. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to designate depositaries of public moneys in foreign countries and in the Territories and insular possessions of the United States.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12073) to provide additional compensation for certain civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I shall consume but little time.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator allow the regular order—the tariff bill—to be laid before the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The pending amendment is in paragraph 329, page 64, line 15, where the committee proposes to strike out the figure "1" before the word "cent" and insert in lieu thereof "seven-eighths of 1," so as to read:

Chain and chains of all kinds, made of iron or steel, not less than three-fourths of 1 inch in diameter, seven-eighths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the Evening Mail, a New York journal, on the subject of the tariff, entitled "Why the tariff bill should pass." It is a very thoughtful article on the measure pending before the Senate, and I ask consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Mail.]

WHY THE TARIFF BILL SHOULD PASS.

A tariff for protection is a tariff for the American people and for American prosperity.

It has been tested time and again and has never failed.

It is the policy that has held the American home market for the American farmer.

It is the policy that has developed every American industry, maintained every American wage scale above the competing wage scale in other countries, and made the American wage earner the best paid workingman in the world.

The pay envelope of the American wage earner under a protective tariff always carries more contentment, better living conditions, and greater individual possibilities than any other pay envelope anywhere.

Every Democratic free trade law ever enacted has sooner or later forced industrial depression and panic; every protective tariff law has encouraged industrial expansion and created prosperity.

Whenever the Republican Party has been given power in the Nation it has been because its first principle is, through protection, to assure stability and prosperity to our farms and factories. A Republican Congress has always met that expectation as its most immediate duty.

This Congress has delayed too long performing that duty. It should have enacted a tariff law months ago. Farmers know, indeed the country knows, what the emergency tariff, passed a year ago, has done to put our farmers back on the road to prosperity. It provided them with a market. Our industries are entitled to the same helpful legislation. The Republican Congress is a year late in according it to them; it is now time for action.

The Senate is making progress with such a bill. It is frankly a measure designed to protect American industries. That is as it should be. It is no better and no worse than every other protective tariff ever enacted. Flaws can be found in it, of course. Every revenue law has them. The great Democratic tariff law of the Cleveland administration was denounced by Mr. Cleveland as "a badge of party perfidy and dishonor," and Senator Calvin Brice, himself chairman of the Democratic National Committee, graphically described the scenes in the Senate as "a wild orgy of the trusts."

These characterizations of the work of a Democratic Congress were made by a Democratic President and a Democratic United States Senator. Despite his denunciation of it, Mr. Cleveland did not veto the measure. It became a law without his signature—the only revenue law we ever had without presidential sanction.

Free-trade Democrats in the Senate are assailing the pending bill with prophecies that it will add to the cost of living. That is an old, old story with free traders. For nearly a century they have been saying it over and over again until it has worn so deep a groove in the Democratic platform that no Democrat can see over the sides of it.

All that they have said in the present debate was uttered in precisely the same terms by their Democratic predecessors of years ago in denouncing every protective tariff law before enactment.

Never do these same Democrats—or did their predecessors—justify their argument by taking the figures of a protective tariff period to prove that protection has ever added a penny to the cost of living. They do not do it, because results do not show it.

Democrats talk fiercely of what a protective tariff will do, but you never can get a word out of them as to what a protective tariff has done.

The difference is the difference between prophecy and results.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was astounded at the position taken by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that the Senate had no right to call upon a Federal reserve bank for the information asked in my resolution. I am surprised, in the first place, that the Senator would take such a stand. I hold that his position is utterly untenable, in the second place.

I do not know, but it is difficult for me to believe that any other Senator would agree with him that the Senate—which helped to create the Federal reserve banking system, which established 12 regional banks, with the Federal Reserve Board as the governing power, with its members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and with that board naming the governor of every Federal reserve bank—had no right to call upon one of those banks for the information sought in the resolution. I can not understand the Senator's method of reasoning and the logic of his strange argument in this matter.

I was also surprised when the Senator took the position that he opposes the passage of the resolution calling upon those banks to give the information which I seek in the resolution. The Senator's speech had been sent to those on the mailing lists of those banks at the expense of the banks and partly at the expense of the Government, because a part of the money which they accumulated goes into the Government. I hold, and I have scores of letters from all over the country which hold, that this is a bad practice; that these banks have no right to take up any Senator's speech assailing the position of another Senator on a great public question and circulate it at their expense and thus indulge in politics in that way.

These banks have used Federal reserve bank mailing lists. They have sent out the speech of the Senator from Virginia. What right have they to do that? Am I right or wrong in that request? I was not seeking to reprimand them, although they should have been reprimanded for manifest political activity. I am asking to have them tell the Senate who suggested that they send out that speech. Is not that a fair proposition? Are we going to permit these banks to go into politics? Is that the purpose of Senators who would thus shield them in this pernicious activity? What right had they to take the speech of a Senator, a speech that assailed me in a number of instances and undertook to refute statements that I made upon this floor, with very critical references made to myself in that speech, and mail it out in that way? The term "demagogue" was applied to those of us who opposed the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy, and was employed frequently. The word "ignorance" and statements like that toward myself and those who opposed the deflation policy were employed. That speech was circulated by these governmental institutions. The bank at Atlanta admits sending out 6,500 copies of the Glass speech down in my territory, and those speeches cost $15 a thousand to have them printed. I am calling on other banks to give us the same character of information. Who told you to send out this speech? What caused you to send it out? The bank of Atlanta, in response to my question, "Did any member of the Federal Reserve Board suggest it?" said, "No; but the reserve board said they were available." I know just as well as I am living that the Federal Reserve Board inspired the printing and distribution of that speech.

Mr. President, I was surprised to find the Senator from Virginia coming out and opposing the giving of that list to me. Why, he said, "The Senator from Alabama wants to get hold of this mailing list for the purpose of sending his speech to these people." Why not? If I want to send them at my own expense, or if somebody else wants to send them in the interest of fair play, why should the Senator object? These Federal reserve banks sent out the speech of the Senator from Virginia. They had them published by the hundreds and thousands. They had them addressed. They have gone into the hands of thousands of people, and I do not know who received them. I submit to every fair-minded Senator in this body that my request is a fair and just one.

I made a speech assailing the Senator's position. I attacked his figures. I undertook to refute his statements regarding the deflation policy. I quoted figures from the Federal Reserve Board Bulletin. I gave facts from its own records, and they do dispute the statements of the Senator from Virginia. Why should I not have the right to lay my statements before the people who have read his speech? Why should I not have that right?

I want to give the Senate just a small measurement of what was in his speech and what I said. The Senator from Virginia said:

I pointedly deny that there was deflation of either regional reserve bank credits or any diminution of Federal reserve currency for the period of the appalling drop in prices of agricultural products. * * *

Instead of deflating credits and currency, the Federal reserve banks, during the period of falling prices, enormously expanded bank credits and increased the volume of circulating notes.

Now, listen, Senators! Here is what I said on February 9 as to what the official records prove:

The Reserve Board's own figures, printed in the Federal Reserve Bulletins, clearly prove that Senator GLASS made a grave and inexplicable blunder in asserting, as he did in his speech, and then in printing the statement in the pamphlet speech in italics, that "during the whole period of falling prices the Federal reserve banks were supplying largely increased credit facilities and issuing a constantly increasing volume of Federal reserve notes," for an analysis of the reports shows, irrefutably, that in precisely the "period of falling prices," through which we have been passing, there was not only no "enormous expansion" by the reserve banks in either "bank credits" or "circulating notes," but in the 12 reserve banks there was an actual contraction of $2,005,149,000 in the Federal reserve credits—

Those facts come from the Federal Reserve Board Bulletin. If they are not correct, I am not responsible for that.

And a contraction of $927,026,000 in the volume of Federal reserve notes.

Now, Senators, I want these figures to go in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings. Listen, here are the facts:

Loans, discounts, and bought paper held by all of the 12 Federal reserve banks.

May, 28, 1920 (p. 748, Federal Reserve Bulletin, 1920)	$2,938,031,000
Aug. 31, 1921 (p. 1240, Federal Reserve Bulletin, 1921)	1,527,255,000
Jan. 25, 1922	932,882,000

Contraction of credits by the 12 Federal reserve banks.

May 28, 1920, to Aug. 31, 1921	$1,410,776,000
May 28, 1920, to Jan. 25, 1922	2,005,149,000

Contraction of Federal reserve notes in circulation.

May 28, 1920, to Aug. 31, 1921	$625,555,000
May 28, 1920, to Jan. 25, 1922	923,020,000

In refutation of the emphatic assertions by the Federal reserve authorities that they did not proceed to deflate credits, attention is asked to the following excerpt from the bulletin issued by the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, under date of December 20, 1919, addressed to "all member banks":

"Our present task, therefore, is to proceed with the deflation of credits as rapidly and as systematically as possible."

If my position is correct—and I feel that it is—are not those who have read the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] entitled to have my speech sent to them? As a Member of this Chamber in which sits the Senator whose speech has been sent broadcast by these banks, these great governmental institutions seeking to injure me because I have dared to call a spade a spade and to criticize and condemn them for their deflation policy, am I not entitled to have my speech read by the people who have read his speech? Would not a sense of common fairness require that? What is there wrong in that?

Senators, is there anything wrong in the suggestion that I have made? I must confess that I never expected the position to be taken that the Senator from Virginia has taken on this point in the controversy. I had an idea that he would say, "Why, let him have the information and the list"; but not so; he opposes it; he does not want the committee to permit the resolution to pass. He even takes the ground that we have no right to call in this creature of the Congress and inquire into its conduct, and say, "You have been circulating a speech in which there is a severe arraignment of those who are opposed to the policy of the Federal Reserve Board; you have had that speech printed at considerable expense; you have sent it out; now we want the list of those to whom you sent it, in order that a Member of the United States Senate who has been attacked may have the opportunity, if he desires, to send his speech to those people.

That is not all, Mr. President. I want to know how much money has been expended in this propaganda and who it was who inspired the sending out of that speech in the outset. I ask that question in the resolution of each and every one of these banks. Are we not entitled to know that? Are Senators on the other side going to take the position that we are going to let these banks go into politics; that we are going to let them use the banks' funds and some of the public's funds to circulate somebody's speech, as was done in this instance? Are Senators on the other side of the Chamber not going to permit them to make an accounting to the Congress that created them; to show what they are doing with their money when it is charged by a Senator on this floor that they are misusing it?

Oh, Senators, let no one here or elsewhere be deceived. There is more behind this thing than the mere matter of getting that list. I want the truth known to the country. I want the facts to come out. I want the people to know that these banks, under the suggestion of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, had this speech printed and circulated among the business men and bankers of the United States. They have got one side of it; and the situation that has been presented to them I attack and refute with my figures and with my position upon the question.

The speech of one Senator from Virginia having been circulated, which another Senator claims has a great many inaccurate and incorrect statements in it, and that his speech has the right and correct statements, will not the Senate decide to let each man who has read the one speech read both speeches and decide for himself? Senators, are we not entitled to such a proposition of fair play in this country? This is a republic. The people out yonder who read and inform themselves are entitled to know the truth in order that they may know how properly to cast their votes. Here is the lawmaking body which belongs to them, and here is a Senator who has been fighting a deflation policy that he will believe to his dying day was inaugurated by the money lords of Wall Street, and that it brought ruin upon millions of people in the country. Is he going to be hampered and handicapped and hounded by the very people who have been guilty of the things he charges? Will not the Senate, that has the authority and the power, merely request—for that is what the resolution does—these banks to give that information?

Mr. President, let us get the truth. Let me try again. I offered a resolution a month ago to investigate the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, a bank that holds the purse strings of the States of my section, my State included. The bankers of my State must go to that bank to make arrangements to get their currency and credit, and yet that bank sends out a speech, accompanied by a letter, to the people who must depend on it for currency and credit, and calls on them to give their opinion as to the situation, the speech and all. Mr. President, that is a severe crime in a Republic. I know that there are those, and some of them get into this Chamber occasionally, who have but little regard for the rights of the people. What right has a banking institution which holds the money supply and controls the life blood of business, and especially an institution which is under Government supervision, with its head officer named by the Federal Reserve Board, to go into politics in this fashion? Was I wrong in calling for that information? I could not get it. The committee never acted on that resolution and that resolution is dead. I chose the other course and called on the bank at Atlanta, and that bank has reported, and I am simply requesting that the other banks do likewise. Is there anything wrong in that?

Mr. President, I know that some Senators do not like to hear what I am saying, but they are going to hear a heap more of it before this thing is over. If the President reappoints Governor Harding on the Federal Reserve Board, they never will hear the last of it; I will give it to them morning, noon, and night. We are deeply in earnest about this thing; we do not propose to have a man selected who is stamped all over with the approval of Wall Street to sit unmolested at the head of the Federal Reserve Board and control the money supply of this great Government.

I want to read a statement to Senators to show how efforts are being made to secure indorsements for him. Some of those who are trying to secure his reappointment went up to New Jersey and in some fashion got a bankers' convention there to indorse him. One of the delegates who was present stated that this is what occurred:

Referring to the fact that at their meeting last week the New Jersey Bankers' Association passed resolutions asking President Harding to reappoint Governor Harding as governor of the Federal Reserve Board, a New Jersey banker of the highest standing writes the Manufacturers' Record as follows:

"Nobody felt like saying much about it. I was temporarily out of the conference at the time. The vote was a very feeble one of not more than 10 or 15 out of the three or four hundred people there, and I know it was not favored by the majority of those present."

That, Mr. President, is the character of propaganda going on—sneaking, insidious, slipping around in a convention, sitting with resolutions in their pockets, never saying a word until just before the convention adjourned, and then, when all the delegates have gone, springing a resolution like that with only a handful present.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator state the name of his correspondent in New Jersey? I happened to hear him refer to the New Jersey Bankers' Association.

Mr. HEFLIN. His name is not given.

Mr. EDGE. I imagined it belonged to the anonymous class of communications.

Mr. HEFLIN. The quotation is from an editorial in the Manufacturers' Record which says:

A New Jersey banker of the highest standing writes the Manufacturers' Record as follows:

Then follows what he said as I have read it. I do not believe the name is given, but I will tell the Senator who I think he is; I think he is ex-Governor Stokes, of New Jersey, who is against the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy.

Mr. President, that is what is going on in an effort to have this man reappointed. The interests supporting him are working in every way to bring about his reappointment.

The Senator from Virginia says that if the Senator from Alabama feels like his speech has answered the one the Senator from Virginia made, he felicitates the Senator from Alabama upon his happy frame of mind. That is a nice compliment for the Senator to pay to himself. I have received a number of letters from people in his own State who agree with my position. I am not going to read any of them now. I have letters here from Texas, from Maryland, from Tennessee, and scores of letters from various other States. Just to give an indication of the sentiment outside of his State and mine, I quote from a letter written by the former cotton expert of the State of Texas, Mr. Yearry. He says:

Replying to yours of May 12, on reading your speech on the Federal reserve bank in reply to the speech of Senator CARTER GLASS, allow me to say that you have made a masterful reply and an unanswerable charge against the work of the Federal Reserve Board.

Here is a letter from James A. Martin, manufacturer and wholesale dealer in lumber, of Johnson City, Tenn.

At no time in two years past could business get loans at fair rates so that the user or manufacturer could afford to borrow and expand his business. Mr. HEFLIN is absolutely correct when he charges deflation with destroying values and business in the South.

Mr. President, I am not going to weary the Senate now, but I promise that I will discuss this question at various times, and if ever that man is reappointed I will have much more to say. I will read a letter now from Baltimore—and, as the hour is growing late, I shall read no more letters this afternoon—written by Mr. McCormick. This letter was sent to me by a friend.

It is addressed to Mr. L. C. Younger, district manager of the Provident Life and Trust Co., Richmond, Va.

MY DEAR MR. YOUNGER: I have just read with a great deal of interest your article in the Manufacturers' Record regarding the Federal reserve, and want to thank you for it. I have written a good many articles on this subject. I was president of the Baltimore Commercial Bank for five years. It is the largest State bank in Maryland, a member of the Federal reserve. While I believe in the Federal reserve system, the ideas promulgated by the present régime as well as Mr. Houston are certainly far from sound business. We are paying very, very dearly for them, and it will be years before the majority of business houses can recoup the losses sustained through the unbusinesslike methods of the Federal reserve. Profits in legitimate business, such as ours, are not made as rapidly as in some other.

I hope you will keep up the good work, because I find that the bankers, as a rule, are afraid to say anything, and the majority of our people are totally blind to the situation.

Yours very sincerely,

W. N. MCCORMICK.

Those are all the letters I am going to read this afternoon, Mr. President. I am simply showing you why it is that I have gone to the trouble, week after week and month after month for nearly two years, of condemning a policy that I know strikes at the very heart of the business life of my country. You can talk about your tariff and talk about your ship subsidy and other things, but I am hammering on the livest question in this Nation, and that is the control of the money supply and credits. I know you want to wave it aside, but the American people, descendents of the men who achieved liberty in the Revolution, who won the War of 1812, the war against Mexico, and fought out the great questions between the States in 1861, and won the war with Spain, and then won the great World War—these heroic citizens, men and women, are not going to submit to being held up and having the money supply taken away from them and their business killed in order to make millionaires and billionaires in Wall Street every 5 or 10 years. That is why these papers pounce upon me. I am hammering on the real issue, the one that affects most vitally the whole business fabric of America. That is why they fight me. That is why these banks are willing to take somebody else's speech that defends their position and circulate it and keep back mine, that denounces and condemns their position.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will permit a suggestion—I do not desire to make it, however, in any other thought than that it may be helpful—I recall the Senator's previous resolution, and my suggestion at the time that it be referred in the proper way, in the orderly manner, to the committee having charge of that particular activity—the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator refused to permit that action; and the resolution, as I recall, was on the table for two or three weeks, and perhaps longer, with frequent addresses on the part of the Senator covering in part the same subjects. Finally the Senator sent it to the committee in the usual way, and a subcommittee was appointed. I am not a member of the subcommittee, so I can not discuss what happened in the subcommittee, but the information requested under the resolution came to the Senate and was published, as I recall, rather expeditiously after that action.

If the Senator really wants action, rather than merely the opportunity to talk to the resolution all the time—he can talk anyhow, so far as that is concerned, whenever he gets the floor, whether the resolution is in the custody of the committee or otherwise—it seems to me that if, in the usual way, he would ask to have the resolution referred to the proper committee, and the committee would then appoint a subcommittee to make such inquiry as they thought proper, his desire would not be in the slightest degree delayed. Instead of that, the Senator has chosen to have his resolution lie on the table, without action by the committee, and then from time to time to make a speech about it.

Of course the Senator has that privilege. I am not criticizing it at all, but I think he should have the information. I heard the chairman of the committee to-day make the statement that he would gladly appoint a subcommittee to consider this resolution. Speaking now from precedent, the action that was taken before seems to have been expeditious, and just why the Senator assumes that he will not get action on his resolution if it is referred to the committee now, I do not know. That assumption seems to me entirely unjustified.

I merely make that suggestion in an absolutely friendly manner, because the Senator is entitled to the information, and I think that is the way to get it, not simply to talk on the floor of the Senate to a resolution that is on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the kindly interest of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, who helped to send my other resolution to its long, last sleep. It sleeps there still, Mr. President, with no sign of awaking. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDGE. Was not the information which the Senator requested under the terms of the other resolution received by the Senate after the resolution was referred to the committee?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; not until I had another resolution passed through this body. I got a resolution through here, by unanimous consent, calling on the Atlanta bank to give this information, and to send their mailing list, and they did so. Now I am asking that the other 11 banks do the same thing, and show how much they expended, and how many speeches they sent out, and two or three Senators on the other side are blocking the proposition.

Mr. EDGE. I recall very clearly that after the previous resolution went to the committee, word was received that the Atlanta bank was ready at any time to send the information. I do not think the other banks would feel differently disposed; but this idea of talking forever on the floor of the Senate to a resolution that apparently can not receive action without unanimous consent, when there is other unfinished business before the Senate, certainly does not get the Senator anywhere. It simply gives him the opportunity to make frequent speeches, which he seems to enjoy.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have to remind my friend from New Jersey that I make a speech when I feel it my duty to speak, without consulting him as to when or how long I shall speak, or what I shall speak about. Now, just think. If I had not spoken this afternoon, would I ever have brought out such a suggestion from the Senator from New Jersey? Publicity—giving the facts in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; this is one publication that can not be subsidized. When you tell the facts, and they go out in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the country reads them, and that is what I want it to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senators on the other side will give consent to the passage of this resolution. The Senate has already passed a resolution asking the Atlanta bank for this information, and they have replied. It did nobody any harm. The Senator from Alabama feels that this matter is personal to himself and an attack on him. I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that the Government has nothing to do with the Federal reserve banks. I think the whole system is under the control of the Government. The Senator from Alabama evidently is going to talk on this resolution all this evening; he is going to talk to-morrow; and why not give consent? No harm will be done to anybody, but it will satisfy him and his friends.

I hope the Senators on the other side will yield. The chairman of the committee is here, and I think he will agree with me that no harm will be done by passing the resolution. I ask the chairman of the committee if he will not consent to its passage?

Mr. McLEAN. Is the Senator addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. I ask the Senator to consent to the passage of this resolution. Let us settle the matter. No harm will result to anybody, and it will satisfy a brother Senator who thinks he has been aggrieved in this matter. Why not pass the resolution? It will do no harm, and it is very easy to pass it and elicit this information.

Mr. McLEAN. I think, in the first place, the resolution is in bad form.

Mr. OVERMAN. It may be in bad form.

Mr. McLEAN. I think if it had been addressed to the Federal Reserve Board it would have been in much better form.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rather agree with the Senator; but the Senator's colleague has adopted another plan.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the other resolution was exactly like it, addressed to the bank, and the Federal Reserve Board sent it to the bank. That is the way it is done.

Mr. OVERMAN. This course was taken with regard to the Atlanta bank, and why not take it in regard to the others? There is no harm in it. It can hurt nobody at all, and it will satisfy the Senator from Alabama himself; and I think if consent is given here this afternoon to pass the resolution it will be satisfactory all around, to the Senator and to his friends. I do not believe that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] will object to it, because I believe that the Senator will agree with me that the whole Federal reserve system is under the control of Congress and that we have a right to pass any resolution we please dealing with it.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand that the Senator from Alabama has nearly finished his remarks.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know how long I am going to speak. If this can be done and the resolution agreed to, I will stop now——

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator might as well use up the rest of the afternoon, I think. We are to have a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee to-morrow, and I should like to consult the committee with regard to these matters, if they are to keep coming. I think it is an unfortunate precedent to allow all these resolutions to go through under unanimous-consent agreements. I should like to know what they involve.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator, and yet we have adopted this principle; we have done it before, and why not do it again?

Mr. McLEAN. I think, furthermore, that the resolution should be in proper form, and I should like to have it go to the committee. It seems to me that the Senator from Alabama is as much obligated to consent to let the resolution be referred regularly as I am obligated to withdraw my objection, under the circumstances.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is usually very gracious and kind about these matters, and I thought if I appealed to him probably he would yield. I felt that the Senator has no personal objection because of these technicalities, and this has been done before.

Mr. McLEAN. As I said, I have not voted once, since I have been in the Senate, against a resolution of investigation; but in this particular case there are so many of these resolutions coming along that I should like to consult the committee with regard to the matter, because I have a feeling that we are establishing a precedent here that is going too far.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator. I have opposed a good many proposed investigations but this precedent has already been set, and it does not require the expenditure of any money.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is a bad precedent, the sooner we diverge from it the better.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, if we agreed to the passage of this resolution, we could go along with the tariff bill to-morrow and not have a continuation of these speeches. It will take all day, probably, to discuss the matter. I am making the suggestion only in the interest of economy of time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut declines to withdraw his objection and permit this resolution to pass, and I am forced to proceed and comment upon that.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], one of the ablest, fairest, and best Members of this body, who believes in justice and fair play in everything, is asking now, as a matter of simple justice, something that will not cost the Government one cent. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who opposes giving this information to me and to the country, wants my resolution referred to his committee, of which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is a member, and I am asking the Senate not to do it. I have stated what happened to the other resolution. I never would have gotten that information if I had not gone around to the committee and offered a resolution here that did not cost the Government anything. In that way I got that information. That is all I am asking for now.

What is it that makes Senators want to hold up this resolution until to-morrow? Do they want to confer with the Federal Reserve Board governor? Do they want to talk to the Federal Reserve Board governor, whose conduct I have criticized and expect to continue to criticize? Do they want to ask them whether or not they want to give this information? Is that the object of delaying this thing? What is it, Mr. President? Does it come back to what I suggested in the outset to-day? Whenever you get a matter up here that treads on the toes of big business—business that regards itself as bigger than the Government; business that thinks it has a bought license under which to pillage and plunder the American people; business that can whisper around and have a thing like this held up—what is it that is back of all this thing that we witness here to-day?

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] wants to know why I want to discuss the resolution. Thank God there is free speech in this Chamber! If we have not a free press, we have free speech. Some of the press are free. Some of the newspapers are clean and honest, and all that, and I praise them. When I refer to a subsidized press and an unfair, bought press, I am not referring to the other crowd. Nobody need take offense unless he is hit by what I say.

Mr. President, I got that other information, through another resolution, in a week or 10 days, and I do not think the Senator from Connecticut knew that resolution had passed. I do not think the Senator from New Jersey knew that resolution had passed. Probably both of them, if they had been present, would have objected to it. One of them voted to-day against permitting me to proceed with free speech in this body in order. I heard them. I knew who they were. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] was one of them. I heard him vote against allowing me to proceed in order to discuss a resolution which I introduced, which affects me personally and affects the people I represent, and affects the business life of the whole American people. I am anxious to keep these banks out of politics. When I fight for that I am fighting for the best interests of my country, and when the banks want to get into politics, they are doing that which would drag this Government down.

If the banking institutions, under Government control, are to become mighty factors in politics, Senators, free institutions are in danger. Must I remain quiet or strive to prevent such a condition? We can not get the other side to withdraw an objection to a resolution which simply asks these banks, "Who told you to send out the Glass speech? How many did you send out? How much did you spend in sending them out?"

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama is on the other side of the Chamber from me, and I may have misunderstood him, but did he make the statement that he heard the Senator from New Jersey vote against free speech in the Senate to-day?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want to do the Senator an injustice, but when the motion was made that I be permitted to proceed in order, the Chair put the question; there were a number of ayes, and there were a few noes, and I understood the Senator from New Jersey to vote "no."

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is entirely correct. The Senator from New Jersey did vote "no." The Senator from New Jersey would like to make that perfectly clear and plain, if there is any doubt in the mind of the Senator from Alabama about it. The Senator from New Jersey will always vote "no," when a question of order is put by the Chair to the Senate, when a Senator so far forgets himself as to call a colleague a liar, unless the Senator so offending withdraws such statement——

Mr. HEFLIN. I did withdraw it.

Mr. EDGE. And at that time the Senator from Alabama had not withdrawn the statement.

Mr. HEFLIN. I could not withdraw it. If the Senator understood parliamentary law at all, he would know that. How could I withdraw it until the matter had been disposed of and the Senate had directed under the rule that I proceed in order? But the motion was that I be permitted to proceed in order, and the Senator from New Jersey voted against that motion. I was undertaking to plead for his constituents, the men, women, and children in New Jersey, who have been pillaged and plundered by this deflation policy. I am fighting for the whole people. I know it is a hard fight and a big fight that I am making.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. The subsidized press agents are on every hand, and every sort of ingenuity is employed to suppress what I say and keep it from the country. I know it is a hard fight, but I am going to make it if I live.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator can not evade the actual happening in that way. Of course, the Senator was very properly called to order, and, as he says, technically could not have spoken until relieved of that ban. That is very true. But there was only one time for a Senator to express his feeling of—I do not want to use the word "contempt," and I will not use it——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can not use it toward me.

Mr. EDGE. To express his feeling, certainly, of difference of opinion, when a Senator will permit himself to forget himself, even for a moment, and use a term of that kind on the floor of the United States Senate. The only time that any Senator could express his view of it was when the motion was made. The Senator as a rule is rather difficult to stop in debate, and he could have withdrawn that expression before the actual call to order was made. He was still standing on the floor; he was trying to speak; but he made no effort to withdraw the word until after the motion was made, and then he did. So that I voted "no," and I will always vote "no" when any Senator so far forgets himself as that.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was on my feet, but the rule was produced, and the Presiding Officer said that both Senators should be seated. I sat down. Just as soon as I got the floor I withdrew the remark I made. I was provoked into it. The Senator from Virginia himself acknowledged that I had not used the language he thought I had used, so I can not be blamed, for I was provoked into using the language I did. Of course, I regret violating the rules of this body at any time, and hope to keep within them; but, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey fought hard and fought bitterly to refer my other resolution, which called for information from these banks, to the Banking and Currency Committee.

He is not new in the arena with regard to this thing. He is an old hand at the business. He fought the other proposition, just as he is fighting this one. Of course, the suggestion of a Senator being indignant at a Senator losing his temper is very good. But there are other things beside and behind that. The Senator from New Jersey evidently does not want these banks called upon for this information. I want them to give it. I am going to keep on——

Mr. EDGE. The Senator must adhere to the facts. I stated very frankly—and I will not permit the Senator to put words into my mouth—that the orderly method was to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and that does not infer any policy whatever. At the same time I suggested—and the RECORD will so show—that, so far as I was concerned, the Senator was entitled to the information, and I repeat it. So I resent the suggestion of the Senator that I do not want him to get the information.

As far as I am concerned, he can have the information at any time; but I do resist this attempt to circumvent the rules and the practice of the Senate because a Senator feels that he is personally aggrieved. He has no reason to assume that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, or the committee, will not treat his resolution in a proper and orderly manner, and inasmuch as he has made it so personal, I will tell him right now, without calling a quorum, that I will personally object to unanimous consent for the consideration of that resolution in its present form at any time he requests it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, I personally notify the Senator from New Jersey now that I will speak on it frequently in his hearing, if he is here, and I hope he will be here from now on.

Mr. President, I know Senators frequently get up and say, "I personally have no objection, but let this thing go to the committee." Here is the place to express their personal objection, and when they do it and refer the matter to a committee, then I must judge them. As the Bible says, "By their fruits ye shall know them." As I said here day before yesterday, I judge what they intended to do by what they do. If they say that personally they do not object, that is all right, and I like to hear them say that. But what are the facts? What has become of that resolution, about which the Senator talked so friendly at that time? It never has been reported. It is as dead as a doornail, and I had to get the information by another resolution in this body. I just want the facts to go to the country, and I expect to see to it that they do go to the country.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will convey the information to nearly 40,000 readers in the United States to-morrow, for nearly that many RECORDS go out, and they will read in the various homes and hamlets of America of an effort made by a Senator to get some information of interest to the country and of interest to him and how the fight that was made by those opposing the passage of the resolution.

If the Federal Reserve Board do not object to it, why do you want to postpone action on it to-day? Do the banks object to giving this information? Is that what we want to wait for? I do not care whether the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve banks object. I am a lawmaker in the greatest lawmaking body in the world, and I speak, in part, for one of the sovereign States of this Union; and in my place and right as a Senator I demand this information of these banks created by law in a body of which I was a Member, for I was a Member of the other House at the time the bill was passed creating the Federal reserve system.

Why am I not entitled to this information? This banking system was administered fairly and well until the late spring of 1920, when it inaugurated the deflation policy which was indorsed by the Senator from Connecticut, hitherto an opponent of the Federal reserve banking system. I was for the system in the beginning; I am for it still. I was for the Federal Reserve Board up until the late spring of 1920; but when the Federal Reserve Board trafficked with that system and commenced to manipulate it as Wall Street decreed should be done and broke down business in my section, lost the people of my State more than a hundred million dollars, and I stood up here and protested against it, and the Senator from Connecticut defended it. He came across this aisle and shook hands with the Senator from Virginia on his speech, which has been circulated by these Federal reserve banks. He congratulated him upon that speech. Hitherto he had been against the system. Now he is for it. Now he is for the board.

Now, let me read to the Senate a letter put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the able and distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. A better friend the farmer never had in this or any other legislative body. He put a letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday, to be found on page 9069. It was headed:

The future of cotton—Short-sighted policy of the world's spinners and manufacturers.
(By Sir Charles W. Macara, Bart., Manchester, England.)

He is president of the Cotton Spinners' Association of England, and in a letter to Hon. Harvie Jordan, who used to be president of the American Southern Cotton Association, this language was used by this great Englishman, 3,000 miles away, a spinner, and head of the spinners' organization of his country:

Not only is the boll-weevil menace a terrible reality, but the result of the drastic deflation in the market value of staple farm products has brought farmers in the South to the verge of ruin.

Then talk about making an attack upon the Federal Reserve Board without any facts to back it up! I know what I am doing. I am hitting this crooked bunch in a tender place. I believe in calling a crook in high place a crook, just as I would call a common crook in the common walks of life a crook. This country will be better off when more of that is done in responsible positions. Why should I come around treading on velvet, talking about a man who I believe speculated in cotton himself at the time he was denying the farmers loans, with which to withhold their cotton from the market, and he was beating the price down below the cost of production. I believe, and I repeat on this floor, that I believe he made hundreds of thousands of dollars speculating in cotton. Then they say to me that I ought not to make this fight! My sense of right and justice impels me to make this fight.

Now, when I did make the fight I invited from Virginia the able and brave John Skelton Williams, one of the bravest and best Americans living to-day, a man who was Comptroller of the Currency for eight years, the best comptroller, so stated to me by a Virginian that Senator GLASS said of Williams, that we had had in 40 years. I invited him to come to Washington. We went over the Federal reserve bulletins and facts and figures that he had gathered and that he knew about while he was Comptroller of the Currency. I said, "I am going to reply to Senator GLASS's speech and I want the facts and nothing but the truth." We went into those things in the two or three conferences we had. I marshaled those facts under his aid, with the figures that we obtained from their own records, and brought them in here, and in a five-and-a-half hours' speech refuted the arguments of the Senator from Virginia, and he never undertook to answer my statements until to-day, and that feebly and only in a general way.

I am asking for the opportunity to send out that speech of mine to the people who read the Senator's speech, which I say contains so many inaccurate and incorrect statements. I think he was imposed on by the board. They grabbed up the speech he made and circulated it. Now, I am asking that I, not the board, not the bank, not a cent of expense to the Government, be given the opportunity to circulate my speech that I made in the Senate in the interest of right and justice to me and to the whole people of the United States. That is all I ask, but I am held up. Now, then, I must give my opinion and impressions to the country. I want the country to know that we can get nothing through here that affects for good the American people if it in any way pertains to this big banking octopus of the East without some eastern Senator blocking it. When will the West wake up? When will the North wake up and the South? When will they combine their strength and crush this octopus that flourishes in wrongdoing in Wall Street and has become so big that when a Senator assails it on this floor there are editorials written about him wherever there is a Federal reserve bank located. Is not that strange?

Do you know what I said here the other day? I said that I was informed by a former official of the United States Government that one of the editors of one of the big dailies in New York, who used to be in the employ of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, is now on the pay roll of the Federal Reserve Board, or on the pay roll of the Federal reserve bank, at New York, and I told you that you would not see it announced in a single newspaper next day, and you did not, did you? Do you remember that? Then ask me why I stand here and expend my strength day after day in this hot summer. Somebody has to fight. Somebody ought to fight. I told you from my place here that when the Supreme Court handed down a decision, in which it criticized and condemned the Federal Reserve Board's treatment of a State bank in Nebraska, that it was not given to the country, and I had letters about it from people, and one paper out in the West had an editorial that first called my attention to it. It said, "Why was not that bit of news given to the country"?

Should I remain silent, although it is more in keeping with ease and comfort to sit silent a hot day like this, when I see these forces creeping up little by little and step by step? No, Mr. President, I would rather have it said of me when I am gone, whether I live long or die soon, that when these concerns with mighty tread were stealing up slowly but surely upon the Government and its instrumentalities that he was there fighting as best he could; that those who were hired to write editorials attacking him did not deter or intimidate him; that the effort to hamper and hinder him in the fight failed utterly; "he fought on and on for what he believed was right." I would rather leave that record to my boy and to those of my relatives and friends than any other record I could make.

I have never mistreated a Senator in this Chamber. I never have been an initiator of anything that looked in that direction. I have resented things when I felt it my duty to do so. They who fight for the right encounter obstacles and difficulties. They have no easy path to walk. They must fight. I recall the old hymn. "Sure I must fight if I would win. Increase my courage, Lord." That is the slogan. Fight what? Fight predatory interests that feel that they are greater than the Government. Fight to keep banking institutions created by law to serve the business needs of the people out of politics. Fight those who will take a speech brimful of attacks upon a Senator and full of statements the correctness of which are challenged and broadcast it over the country, costing thousands of dollars.

Why, Mr. President, I know I have stirred up strong opposition amongst them. I am astounded to see the enthusiastic and determined effort on the other side of the Chamber of the two Senators from the East who are opposed to this resolution. One of them, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], says he does not object personally and yet he serves notice on me that he will object personally to the consideration of the resolution. Is he offended with me personally? There is no just cause for it. No Senator in this body could offend me enough personally to make me object to a resolution like this. I would not put it on that ground; so help me God, I would not. I would permit a Senator to put a resolution like this through, even if I did not speak to him. So let us come out in the open on this thing.

I will be getting letters from New Jersey and from Connecticut and from other sections of the country on this fight to-day. I have had them on every fight I have made, from nearly every State in the Union, saying, "More strength to your arm."

Senators, that is the way the people feel to-day. They know the danger of the money power in politics. We were told by George Washington to fight against it. We were told by Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln to fight against it. When we inaugurated the Federal reserve system under the leadership in this body of the great Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], President Wilson said we had broken the power of the Wall Street gang and driven them from the control of the money system and the credits of the country. I am fighting to keep this system out of politics. I want you to help me to do it. I am doing it in the interest of the country. I have had letters from all over the country saying that I was right in this matter. I have scores of them from Virginia saying that I am right. Yet here I am confronted with the proposition that I have not the right to ask for this information, and that I ought not to have it; that I ought not to be able to send my speech out to the people who read the speech of the Senator from Virginia.

Senators, the work of this day will be recorded, and you will hear from it many times before the campaigns of 1922 and 1924 are over. We are talking now about the most vital thing in this Government. They who control the money supply, they who hold the purse strings, they who manipulate the credits of the Nation, control the lifeblood of business in the whole United States.

Am I to be condemned for demanding that Federal reserve banks shall keep out of politics and perform the duties for which they were created?

I am a friend of the system. I helped to create it and in the Democratic caucus in the House I fought to have cotton recognized, and the warehouse receipts of the farmer so recognized that he could borrow money on them to help him obtain the cost of production plus a profit. My friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is a friend of the system. He is just like I am with reference to the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Here is the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, who is opposed to me, of course. The Senator from Virginia said he wrote him a letter stating that the reason why he did not go home and vote was that he would have to vote for me, and I replied that he knew I would expose his crookedness if ever I got into the Senate. That is the man at the head of the board. I have read documents here from various sources condemning him, and I have read an editorial from the Manufacturers' Record just bristling with indignation at the suggestion of his reappointment, and showing how the honest business men and bankers of the country would resent it; and yet he is appointing the governors of the other banks and having a speech sent out; at least, they said at Atlanta that it was suggested the speech was available, and, of course, he suggested that they send it out. None of them would ever have been circulated by these banks but for the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. He appoints the governors of these banks. Do you understand, Senators?

Now, they have sent them out.

I said, "All right, there is Senator GLASS's speech in pamphlet form, and here is mine. You had his printed at Government expense and at the expense of the banks. The Government is entitled to a little interest in the funds you have expended. I want you to give Congress a list and let us see what you have done. I want to send my speech where you have sent his." But Senators on the other side, a couple of them, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], oppose the resolution. The Senator from New Jersey said that personally he does not object to me having the information, but the RECORD will disclose the fact that he said he would object to the consideration of the resolution. I leave it for the reading public, those who read the RECORD, to decide just what his attitude is in the matter.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just this in conclusion: The American people are having some very strange thoughts about Congress. The impression is growing stronger every day that big special interests have a hold on the Government under this administration such as they never had before; the impression is growing that the man with big means is all and all at this Capitol, and that the rank and file of the men and women out yonder are apparently of little consequence. They need our help—the rank and file.

The speech of the Senator from Virginia contained some of the same points made by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board in his speech.

The Senator's speech was sent out—6,500 copies of it by 1 bank of the 12. If the bank at Atlanta, in a section of country which is not so thickly populated as is the eastern section, sent out 6,500 copies of that speech, how many do Senators suppose were sent out from New York? I had a letter from a gentleman the other day stating that a New York lawyer told him that he thought that everybody in New York had received one of those speeches. Now, the Federal Reserve Board has had that speech circulated. I am asking for the right and opportunity to circulate my speech in order that the American reader may decide for himself the question regarding deflation as presented by two United States Senators.

Mr. President, I submit the question to the intelligent and fair-minded people of the country.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] intended to address the Senate to-night on the tariff bill, but he has said that at this late hour it would be impossible for him to conclude, and that time would be saved by letting his speech go over until to-morrow. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will yield to me for a moment, I wish to say merely a word. I have no desire to make an address at all, but simply to correct the last statement made by the Senator from Alabama, and which I think in fairness should be corrected. The Senator from Alabama said, if I heard accurately what he said, that two United States Senators have prevented him from getting the information he desires. I think I can speak for the Senator from Connecticut, and I know I can for myself. We have not prevented the Senator from getting the information; that must be made absolutely clear; we have merely insisted that he obtain the information in the usual regular and orderly manner by having the resolution referred to the committee having charge of such activities.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator now give consent that the resolution may be considered at this time?

Mr. EDGE. I will not.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is all.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were opened, and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 23, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 22, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, in whom we have our being, make Thy name excellent in all the earth. In all lands, upon all peoples, let shine the sun of Thy righteousness. In wondrous ways Thou dost show Thyself. Give us eyes to see the story of Thy goodness in all the displays of Providence. Be with us, O Heavenly Father. If the burden is too heavy to bear, touch it; if the heart is bound to earthly idols, release it; if the eye is dimmed with tears that we dare not approach, dry them; and in gracious mercy open Thy hand of bounty to all. In the blessed name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by former Commissioner of Corporations Davies upon the subject of standardized prices.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman expects to put these remarks in the back of the RECORD?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. On what subject is it?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Standardizing prices. It was delivered in this city by former Commissioner of Corporations Davies and is a very interesting legal argument.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean a legal argument in favor of the Government standardizing prices?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; it is the standardizing of prices by manufacturers.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman thinks it will add anything to the knowledge of Congress, I have no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is this the gentleman who was formerly a Federal trade commissioner?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; he was former chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any legislation pending in Congress on this subject?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Reserving the right to object, when the gentleman speaks of standardizing prices, he means retail prices?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Wholesale and retail prices.

Mr. OLDFIELD. And also means to have something to do with fixing the retail prices of various articles.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. This is a legal study of court decisions upon that matter.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Does this gentleman take the position that manufacturers of articles should have the right to fix the retail price to the consumer?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It goes over the entire matter in a legal way for the last 15 years, and gives the Supreme Court decisions upon the question. It is more a legal discussion than an argument, although, of course, that phase is brought out. He is in favor of that right through legislation pending in this Congress.

Mr. WINGO. Has the Attorney General read this?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am not sure about that.

Mr. WINGO. I suppose the gentleman will submit it to him.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is this Mr. Davies from Wisconsin?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; I think he is. He was formerly commissioner of corporations and later Federal Trade Commissioner. Yes; he is from Wisconsin.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This is not laying the foundation for a further senatorial campaign, is it?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Not that I know of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission granted by the House, I desire to place in the RECORD the following address on "Price standardization," by Hon. Joseph E. Davies, former Commissioner of Corporations and chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, delivered at the Twenty-second Annual Convention of the American Booksellers' Association in the city of Washington:

PRICE STANDARDIZATION.

I am pleased to have this opportunity of addressing you upon this very interesting and important subject. By reason of my experience as an official of the Government of the United States, I presume that I have had the benefit of the slant of the public official view upon questions, and in that connection I wish to say that the proponents of price standardization have given evidence, in a very practical way, of their appreciation that the public interest is paramount to their individual, selfish interests in this situation, and to a very remarkable degree the proponents of this idea have evidenced a largeness of mind and a broadness of vision and a high character of purpose that reflects distinct credit upon them as citizens as well as people who are interested in fair trade.

I say that for this reason: You will notice that the qualification of the Federal Trade Commission in its indorsement of this idea is that there shall be public or official scrutiny of prices made by manufacturers upon goods that are price maintained. And because public officials are thinking in terms of public interest, not only as to what is beneficial for manufacturers and distributors, but as well what is to the interest of the consumer, undoubtedly that qualifying indorsement was placed in the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission, and the significant part of that situation is that the proponents of this idea recognized it, seized it, and embodied it as a part of their plan, thus giving concrete and positive proof that they were concerned in this enterprise, not because of selfish purposes primarily, but with a very high sense of their duty and their obligation to the public. And the Stephens-Kelly bill embodies just such protection; and there is nothing in the Stephens-Kelly bill, and there is nothing in this idea of price standardization which any public-minded man, thinking in terms of the public, can possibly take exception to. It is honest, it is straight, it is in the interest of the public, and it is in the interest of honest manufacturers and honest distributors, and, in my opinion, in the interest of society itself.

Those of us who have given close study to the merchandising problem and to the place of the standard price in the distributing system, find it difficult to reconcile the recent developments of the law with the best interests of the public. We see the building up of standards of quality, the establishment of honest, faithful production, and consequent establishment of a proper and valuable good will, and we see the tearing down of the good will thus established through years of faithful effort by trade pirates who steal this property of the producer for dishonorable exploitation. And during the past decade we have seen the building up of a body of law which protects the thief and renders the honest quality producer helpless to protect that which is his own.

You gentlemen will recall that in your trade you were first confronted with this trend of the law in 1908, when the Supreme Court, in the case of Bobbs-Merrill Co. v. Straus, held that the copyright monopoly does not include the right to impose, by notice, a limitation upon the price at which a copyrighted book may be resold.

In 1911 the Supreme Court, in the case of Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., held that resale price maintenance contracts were in restraint of trade and unlawful, in violation of the Sherman law. Then came the so-called Sanatogen case (Bauer & Cie v. O'Donnell), in which the Supreme Court in a 5 to 4 decision held that a notice on a patented preparation licensing resale at no less than a designated price, and warning that a sale at a less price would constitute patent infringment, was without effect, and that sales at less prices than those designated would not constitute a patent infringement. Following that case in 1913, in the case of Straus v. American Publishers' Association, the Supreme Court extended the principle laid down in the Bobbs-Merrill case, by holding that resale price maintenance contracts on copyrighted books were unlawful under the Sherman Act.

THE RIGHT TO REFUSE TO SELL.

The results of all these decisions up to this point were to make it impossible for manufacturers to protect their good will and the right to see that all customers were able to purchase their products at the same price, either by use of patent or copyright notices or by contracts with distributors. The outcome of this situation was to compel the manufacturers of identified merchandise to resort to what they considered their undoubted rights of refusal to sell in order to protect the good will of their products. The right to refuse to sell to price cutters was indeed upheld by the Supreme Court in the Colgate case, but, as you know, the later decisions have so developed as to make this a bare right, difficult of practical application.

The first limitation appeared in the Schrader case, which not only reaffirmed the Doctor Miles medical case as to the illegality of express price maintenance contracts, but also suggested by way of dicta, that an implied contract to maintain prices is also within the ban of the law. This immediately suggested to many of us the possibility of courts finding that a manufacturer who refused to sell to those who did not maintain suggested prices entered into an implied contract with every distributor who knew of the policy and purchased goods with that knowledge and the intent to maintain the suggested prices, and in fact carried out the intent, had entered into an implied contract to sell at the suggested resale price in violation of the law as interpreted by the Supreme Court.

This possibility was indeed strengthened by the subsequent decision of the Cudahy case—Frey & Son against Cudahy Packing Co.—which held that the circuit court of appeals was in error in holding that the trial judge should have instructed a verdict for the defendant on the grounds that there was no showing of an express contract, and stated that "the essential agreement, combination, or conspiracy might be implied from course of dealing or other circumstances."

Then came the recent Beechnut decision (Federal Trade Commission v. Beechnut Packing Co.) in which a still further limitation was established. In that case the court held that the resale price maintenance system, being contrary to public policy, under the Doctor Miles case and subsequent decisions, constitutes an unfair method of competition, in violation of the Federal Trade Commission act, for a company to create and maintain a system of resale price maintenance, by cooperation with dealers or others even though no agreement, express or implied, exists between the manufacturer and the distributor. It condemns the carrying into effect by cooperative methods a system by which the manufacturer, distributor, customer, and agent undertake to prevent others from selling the manufacturer's product at less than a designated price.

Thus you see the progress—first, an express contract was held to be unlawful, then an implied contract was held to be unlawful, and then a system of seeking by cooperative means to maintain a resale price system was held to be unlawful.

COOPERATION FORBIDDEN.

In effect it places under the ban of the law the most effective methods by which the manufacturer may protect the good will of his product by refusal to sell. The most effective if not the only practical method by which the manufacturer may ascertain who is demoralizing his products by price cutting is by securing the necessary information upon which investigations may be predicated from other distributors in the trade. While this decision leaves to the manufacturer the bare right to refuse to sell, he is, to put it mildly, severely handicapped in his ability to secure the necessary information.

For instance, what sales manager, when he receives a complaint as to price cutting, could do anything unless he received that information from some person in the trade who knew of it? When he acts upon that information received from some one in the trade, there is danger that he may be engaging in a cooperative method to maintain a price maintenance system which comes under the ban of the law, so that while the manufacturer may have the right to refuse to sell, the means to exercise that right, the use of a cooperative method—and almost any method by which he would receive it would be cooperative—is placed under the ban of the law, and consequently the refusal to sell is a bare right.

It must be apparent, therefore, that we can now only protect the good will of the manufacturer of identified articles, and protect the public from the unfair practices of predatory price cutters, and discrimination, by changing the law, as it exists to-day through remedial legislation, such as the Stephens-Kelly bill provides. In view of the fact that these decisions condemning price maintenance have all been under the Sherman law, it might give rise to the suggestion that to attempt to establish a price-maintenance system is an attack upon the principle of the Sherman law. That is untrue. The principle of the Stephens-Kelly bill is in accord with the principle of the Sherman law, and is that development which evolution and society require to preserve the Sherman law as an active agency for the protection of the society and the competitive order. The Sherman law was enacted for the purpose of preserving industrial freedom and preventing monopoly. That principle we all subscribe to. That principle, if we came to the knob of the situation, we would all fight for, because the monopolistic order of society inevitably leads to regulation, inevitably leads to price control, and within a generation or two would inevitably lead to State ownership, which means State socialism, and State socialism means the negation of individual effort. It means an oligarchy of brains, then an oligarchy of power, the complete denial of individual rights, and the complete destruction of our representative form of republican government.

We stand unqualifiedly, as do all thinking men of all political parties and all publicists, for the preservation of the competitive order and for the principles of the Sherman law. But since the Sherman law was enacted much water has gone over the wheels. We have found that the law must go further than the Sherman law goes in order to protect society from monopoly, that the law must prevent the seeds of monopoly from germinating. It was for this purpose that the Federal Trade Commission was created, because it was recognized that unfair methods of competition were the seeds of monopoly and were those means which were employed to create monopoly. And we maintain, and we can support that proposition, that selling copyrighted, honest merchandise below cost and at less than a fair price is an unfair method of competition, and is, therefore, within the ban of the law and is entirely consonent with the principle of the Sherman law.

IS IT A NECESSARY PROTECTION?

We find ourselves, therefore, in this rather anomalous situation, that under the strict language of the Sherman law, the restraint of trade clause, this system is held to be unlawful by any means projected. We find that the Federal Trade Commission, as a matter of public policy, has gone on record in favor of this system as a means of preventing an unfair method of competition. But there is a gap in the law between the Sherman law and the Federal Trade Commission act. There remains no choice for the Federal Trade Commission but to enforce the law, as the Supreme Court of the United States has declared the law to be under the Sherman law. What is needed to secure the adequate relief in this situation is additional legislation which the Federal Trade Commission has indorsed and approved and which is embodied in a very scientific and intelligent way in the Stephens-Kelly bill. The only question, then, which need be further discussed is the question of whether or not the standard price system is, in fact, a necessary protection to the manufacturer and the public and within the public interest.

You gentlemen who are engaged in the sale of books and the other lines of merchandise customarily sold therewith have undoubtedly learned by hard experience the necessity of a standard price system, both for the protection of yourselves and for the protection of the public. Most of you have, no doubt, become the victims of unfair competition of some department store, drug store, or chain store which has carried a line of books and has chosen from time to time to cut the price below that which will show a reasonable profit, or even to such an extent as to show an actual loss. You have seen these stores willfully cut the price of books for purposes of destructive competition, with the sole intent of making up their loss on this merchandise from other lines to which they have attracted trade. You have seen such methods absolutely destroy the sale of particular publications in your community; you have seen the absolute theft of the property of the publisher and the property of the author by such methods; you have seen it destroy your own property right, the right to compete in the sale of books and publications at a fair and reasonable profit.

TO CREATE PERMANENT GOOD WILL.

And so I believe that it is unnecessary for me to discuss the subject further from your particular point of view. But as you are the advocates of the standard-price system, as you intend to take this problem to the public, and through them to the legislators, I believe that it will not be amiss for me to discuss this problem as it affects the merchandisers, producers, and consuming public of the identified article as a whole, and not from the standpoint of the problem as it confronts you.

It will be my purpose to try to suggest to you possibly some reason, some argument, which has not previously been called to your attention, and which you may be able to use effectively in this campaign.

The manufacturer of unidentified or unbranded merchandise has little incentive to produce quality. It is true, of course, that an article of quality will sell more readily upon inspection than the inferior article, particularly where the evidence of quality is apparent from casual examination. But unless the article be branded or identified, there is no means by which its quality may create a permanent good will.

Many manufacturers conceive the idea that a permanent good will may be created by the branding or identifying of quality products, the putting out of an article of uniform quality, under a certain brand, the creation of a demand for the article and the consequent building up of a good will in the product.

PUBLIC CONVINCED OF PROFITEERING.

The producer of a thing of quality has performed a very definite service for the public. He has placed at the constant disposal of the consuming public an article of quality, an article of uniform quality. The consumer knows that this article has a definite value—he has used the product and knows it is what he wants. If it be a watch, he knows from experience or the experience of others that it will keep time and perform the service which he desires; if it be an automobile tire, he knows from past experience that it will give him the desired mileage and service.

The manufacturer of such an article has, by continued quality production, created a thing of value, known as good will. In this intangible thing called good will he has a definite and established property right, a property right recognized by the law and the courts of justice. If another attempts to steal that good will by passing off other goods as the products of the producer who owns the good will, the courts will prevent such action by injunction, the Federal Trade Commission will order him who attempts to make use of that good will without right to cease and desist therefrom. The manufacturer or producer who possesses this property known as good will, has the legal right to sell and assign it as he may sell and assign any other property or property right.

Yet the predatory price cutter, under the law as it exists, may steal and destroy this property right of the producer or manufacturer with absolute impunity, and he may do so to the loss and damage, not only of the producer, but to the detriment of the public. You are all familiar with the various methods employed by the predatory price cutter. He selects an article of well-known value and quality, an article the usual price of which to the consumer is universally known, and he makes of this article an advertising leader through which he may make other sales at a profit. He cleverly advertises or displays the identified article of known price and value at a price which means to him on that article an absolute loss. The public knows its value and the public infers exactly what the price cutter intends it to infer—namely, that other articles of merchandise sold by that price cutter are offered at proportionately low prices. You, gentlemen, who are familiar with merchandising, know that this inference must be false. You know that in order to make up a definite loss on one article of merchandise it is necessary for the price cutter to make his profit on another. But through this method the price cutter accomplishes a definite deception on the consuming public. He exploits the identified article, he makes it impossible for his competitors to sell at a profit without being accused of profiteering on the product. The public reasons that, of course, if Mr. Price Cutter can sell that article at a certain price, his competitors who are selling it at a higher price are profiteering. Thus the price cutter not only steals the good will of the manufacturer, but he also steals the good will of his competitor. The competitor must discontinue the sale of the product, whereupon the price cutter loses the advertising value and the advantage over his competitor resulting from the cut price, discontinues the article, and carries the exploitation into another field. The sale of that particular identified product is killed in that community. The price cutter has stolen the manufacturer's good will and the good will of his competitors on the product.

When I was chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, a large number of manufacturers and distributers testified before that body to any number of instances where this condition, as I have outlined it, was brought about by the predatory price cutter. Exactly the same end as that accomplished by the price cutter who employs the leader sales method was sought a few years ago by certain mail-order grocery concerns in the Middle West. These concerns sold groceries in combinations only, advertising extensively in rural publications. This was during the period of sugar shortage, and the advertisements usually carried in scare heads the announcement, "Sugar, 3 cents a pound"; then in smaller type it was explained that sugar in certain amounts could be secured at 3 cents a pound, when purchased in combination with other articles. Most of the other articles were those whose values in the quantities named were unknown to the average housewife, but when the whole combination was figured up investigation showed that these mail-order concerns were securing for the entire combination a price no lower, and in many instances more, than would be charged for the same products by the average "delivery and credit" grocery store in the section in which they operated. The Federal Trade Commission discontinued this practice by orders to cease and desist. That body recognized the obvious deception in this method of merchandising, yet I submit to you that these concerns were employing exactly the same methods as those employed by the predatory price cutter.

ADVANTAGE OF STANDARDIZED PRICE.

The situation resulting from the inability of the producer to control resale prices also operates to the disadvantage of the public. The producer, by establishing uniform resale prices, attempts to prevent discrimination to the consumer, he attempts to make it possible for the consumer in every locality to get the same value at the same price. The consumer likes to know that he can purchase an identified article, the value of which he knows, at a definite price. It saves him the time and expense of shopping. He can send his office boy or his servant to the store to purchase the article he desires in the knowledge that it can be purchased at a definite price.

In addition to this the inability of the producer to establish uniform resale prices on identified articles tends very definitely toward a more expensive and less economic system of distribution, which in the end must lead to higher prices to the consuming public. The large manufacturer knows that in order to protect his good will and prevent discrimination to the public he must by some means, if possible, accomplish the end that his product may be purchased at one price by all. If uniform prices can not be accomplished through the jobber and retailer method of distribution, he must, if possible, establish his own system of distribution. Without the ability to establish uniform resale prices through a jobber and retailer, the tendency is inevitably toward agency distribution. This method of distribution means, of necessity, destroying the economies resulting from the distribution of the costs of selling over the lines of hundreds of different manufacturers.

AGENCY DISTRIBUTION COSTLY.

The inevitable tendency toward the agency system of distribution, as opposed to the jobber and retailer system, is to tend to eliminate the competition of the small manufacturer to the obvious detriment of the public.

The small manufacturer can not finance a system of national distribution. He can not finance a system of warehouses or a system of chain-store distributors. He is dependent upon the present normal method which evolution has developed in society which has been called for by necessity and by experience. He uses the jobber and the retailer. If you have a large group of small manufacturers or a small group of large manufacturers who eliminate the wholesaler and the jobber, you have very nearly established a system of monopoly in production. Further than that, you have destroyed individual opportunity, individual initiative, the chance which your children might have to become great in distribution by reason of their talents. You have gone into a monopolistic order as opposed to the competitive order in that particular industry. More than that, you destroy the very fiber and the best spirit of our community life. When you destroy the independence of the merchants of the small community, then you have gone far in destroying independent public thought.

The small manufacturer is patently without the means to maintain a system of agency distribution, yet in the case where the large manufacturer establishes the agency system the small producer is at a disadvantage by reason of his inability to maintain uniform resale prices.

In addition to this, the existence of uniform resale prices is to the benefit of the public in stabilizing the market. I have not the time to discuss this feature of the situation in detail. I can only say to you, that an investigation conducted by the American Fair Trade League showed that during the abnormal advance in prices of the war period the articles upon which uniform resale prices were maintained increased in a remarkably small ratio to the increase in prices generally.

I have merely tried to suggest to you some of the reasons for the maintenance of uniform resale prices. The standard pricer asks only the right to make use of economic jobber and retailer distribution without danger of the theft of his own most valuable property, his good will. He advertises his product so that he who approves its quality may secure it again and again. He acquaints the public with its value, places it on the shelves of the convenient store, and desires only the right to say to all "there it is for you at the same price." He desires the right to make use of the economies of the distributing agencies who divide their costs over hundreds of lines. He wants only the right to protect those distributors from the unconscionable price-cutter, who uses the known value of the product as a bait to make other sales. His system fosters competition and prevents monopoly, renders the manufacturer's competition immediately effective to the consumer and stabilizes prices in emergency.

The standard-pricer does not wish to destroy competition between manufacturers of similar products; he does not wish to destroy competition between identified and unidentified products, but he does wish, while preserving the benefits of competition of similar articles, to protect the public against discrimination and deception.

The courts have recognized that good will is a property right which should be protected, but they have failed to see that the maintenance of uniform resale prices is essential to the protection of that property right. The subject has been passed upon repeatedly by our highest court, and it is now too late to quarrel with its decisions. Legislation is now the only remedy, and it is incumbent upon every one of us to do his part in making the public see the absolute necessity for such legislation. We must go to the public, and the public must demand of its legislators that the situation be remedied.

In conclusion, I wish to say that all of you who are interested in this subject owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Butler and his associates, who have insistently and persistently attempted to educate the public to this point of view. You are under great obligations to Mr. Whittier, of the American Fair Trade League, and his associates, such as Mr. Ingersoll and others. They have been untiring and highly intelligent in their efforts, and particularly do you owe a debt of obligation to some of the public legislators who have seen this economic issue arise and who have taken it upon themselves to fight your battle. I refer to Mr. ROGERS, of Massachusetts, and to Mr. CLYDE KELLY, of Pennsylvania.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 297. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to call a conference of maritime nations with a view to the adoption of effective means for the prevention of pollution of navigable waters by oil-burning and oil-carrying steamers by the dumping into such waters of oil waste, fuel oil, oil sludge, oil slop, tar residue, and water ballast.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 213. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was notified to bring in absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

REGULATING TRANSACTIONS ON GRAIN-FUTURE EXCHANGES.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 377 (Rept. No. 1130).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11843, a bill for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grain by regulating transactions on grain-future exchanges, and for other purposes; that general debate on said bill shall not exceed two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be considered by sections, and at the conclusion of such consideration the bill, together with the amendments, shall be reported to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the amendments and bill to final passage without intervening motion, except on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution makes in order the consideration of what is commonly known as the grain-futures bill, a bill that had consideration in the House in the earlier part of the session, known as the Tincher-Capper bill. The bill at that time passed the House by a very large majority. It sought to regulate transactions on the grain exchanges by the use of the taxing power. The Supreme Court held that that could not be done, and this bill meets the objection of the court in that it would regulate these exchanges under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The bill has a very large support of the country and in the House, and it has some very pronounced opposition. The matter should be considered by the House and the country given an opportunity to enter its judgment upon a bill that will operate under the law in a constitutional way on this subject.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What is the reason for the concluding phraseology of the rule—except on the motion to recommit.

What does that mean? That is not the ordinary language.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; that varies the language just a little.

Mr. WALSH. What does that mean?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It means that there shall be one motion to recommit, and that there shall be no vote except upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me three minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would state for the information of the House that the Committee on Appropriations is very anxious to go on with the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, and I have presented this rule at this time very largely for my own personal convenience.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Let me say that if this rule is agreed to the Committee on Appropriations will go on with the deficiency appropriation bill to the conclusion of that bill.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understand, but what I wanted to ask of the gentleman who is in charge of the bill is whether the bill is likely to be reached to-day or not?

Mr. MADDEN. It can not be reached to-day, because the Committee on Appropriations will take all day and may have to take some time to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] say that the bill will not be called up to-day? My colleague [Mr. MADDEN] informs the House that the Committee on Appropriations will take all day, although, of course, it might get through sooner than that.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, we have arranged for four hours of general debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we on this side are somewhat interested in knowing just what is going on.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will listen he will get a great deal of information.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I just suggested that it was the purpose, after the conclusion of its consideration by the House, which I hope will result in agreeing to this rule, that the Committee on Appropriations will take up the deficiency appropriation bill and conclude the consideration of that bill, that to be followed by the Committee on Agriculture in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will yield for just a moment, I want to say that there was opposition to the adoption of this rule before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We appreciate the situation and we are not disposed at this time to delay the proceedings of the House. I have no doubt the rule will be adopted, but I think it should be recorded at this stage of the proceedings that such opposition exists, and we still think that this bill in its present shape has not received the careful consideration which it should have had from the Committee on Agriculture. I think it ought to be very materially amended and modified before it becomes a law.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I sincerely hope the bill will have the consideration that its merits require and that the subject requires when it is considered by the House, and I know it will have such consideration.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do I understand under this rule that the time in favor of the bill is to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] and the time against it by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does that mean that the gentleman from Illinois will yield only to those against the bill and that Mr. TINCHER will yield only to those who are for the bill on both sides of the aisle?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I assume the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] will divide the time on both sides of the aisle, as I assume the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] will divide his time on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Preference, however, will be given to those against the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To those opposed to the bill and Mr. TINCHER will yield to those in favor of the bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The reason I asked that was, of course, a whole lot of the Members on this side of the aisle, including myself, favor this bill, and perhaps may want to make some remarks on it. I assume the gentleman will yield to both sides.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the debate to be confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not by the terms of the rule, but I presume it will be confined to the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. Can the gentleman inform the House whether the bill will be considered to-day?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not likely. In fact, I think I am very safe in saying it will not be considered to-day.

Mr. ASWELL. To-morrow?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To-morrow, very likely.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why not make certain it will not be considered to-day?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Conference reports probably will be in to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It will follow the consideration of the deficiency bill in the usual way. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 146, noes 21.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 233, nays 25, not voting 172, as follows:

Mr. Summers of Washington with Mr. Lee of Georgia.

Mr. Nolan with Mr. Mansfield.

Mr. Paige with Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. Olpp with Mr. Larsen of Georgia.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that if my colleague, Mr. SABATH, who is detained on important business, were here, he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12090, the third deficiency bill, and, pending that motion, I wish to see if I can agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] as to the amount of time we shall be compelled to use in general debate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have a number of requests. In order to satisfy all those asking for time I ought to have three hours. I think, perhaps, I could get along with two hours and a half.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman get along with two hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not satisfy even partially some of these requests in that case. It will mean only an hour more. I hope the gentleman will agree on two and one-half hours to a side.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of general debate shall be limited to five hours, two hours and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and two hours and a half to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to five hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and one-half to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 132, noes 5.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum on that vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays none, not voting 183, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:
Until further notice:
Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.
Mr. Bond with Mr. Ward of North Carolina.
Mr. Dempsey with Mr. Hooker.
Mr. Husted with Mr. Sabath.
Mr. Ketcham with Mr. Kindred.
Mr. Perlman with Mr. London.
Mr. Steenerson with Mr. Kunz.
Mr. Vare with Mr. Griffin.
Mr. McFadden with Mr. Sullivan.
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12090) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12090, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For payment of the judgment rendered against the United States by the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York, sitting in admiralty, and certified to Congress in House Document No. 358 of the present session, under the Navy Department, $2,521.24.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I am not able to follow the reading of this bill by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk advises the Chair that he is reading at page 19, line 11.

Mr. VOIGT. Just a moment. I followed the Clerk in reading page 7, to the bottom of line 23, and I did not hear him read lines 24, 25, and the following lines. I ask that those portions be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must assume that when the Clerk states that he has read to a certain point in the bill the Clerk has stated the fact. [Applause.]

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask, for the information of the House, whether the Clerk does state that he has read lines 24 and 25 on page 7?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has already made his statement. The point of order is not sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims and reported to Congress during the present session in House Document No. 356, namely:
Under the Treasury Department, $14,350.83.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I state now to the chairman of the committee that the reading clerk has skipped 10 pages in this bill, and I ask that the Chair take notice of that fact and direct that this bill be read as required by the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already passed upon that.

Mr. VOIGT. I ask that the Chair take notice of the fact that the bill is not being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill from the point where he is now reading, and in future if the gentleman objects that any portion has not been read and will call it to the attention of the Chair at the time it will be read.

Mr. VOIGT. I state now to the Chair that 10 pages of the bill have not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk states otherwise.

Mr. VOIGT. I do not understand that the Clerk does state——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For support of prisoners, United States courts, $23.85.
Total, audited claims, section 2, $3,881,905.11.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a motion is not in order at the present time. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. VOIGT. Do I understand the Chair to rule that there can not be any motion made to dispense with the further reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair at this time.

Mr. VOIGT. Then I withdraw the motion.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the pending bill recommends an appropriation of $40,043,103.31. Of that sum $28,000,000 is to reimburse citizens of the United States who have overpaid their income taxes. During the period since 1917 about $10,000,000,000 of internal revenue taxes have been collected by the Treasury Department. In many cases the taxpayer has underpaid, and in many other cases the taxpayer has overpaid. When the audits are made on the schedules filed, the department discovers whether an underpayment or an overpayment has been made. It has been found that in the matter of underpayment the Treasury Department is collecting about $40,000,000 a month, and out of the whole $10,000,000,000 so far collected we have up to this time appropriated $50,000,000 for overpayment. This $28,000,000 proposed in this bill will make the total refund $78,000,000, while the total collections from underpayments aggregate about $40,000,000 a month, or close to $500,000,000 a year. It may be interesting to note that most of the personal schedules for income tax returns have been audited, and most of the corporation returns on income taxes have not been audited since 1917. The fact that they have not been audited is not due to any desire not to audit them, but to the impossibility of meeting the emergency that has arisen because of the difficulties and disputes that have occurred from time to time in connection with the settlement. It is due also to the fact that they have not had a sufficient force to audit many of the corporation schedules. It is necessary in the selection of men who are qualified to audit claims to take men with special training, and after having had a special training which qualifies them to come into the Government service they are given a further education at the Government expense at a school of accounting under the direction of the Treasury Department. It is not always possible to get the class of men needed for this sort of work.

About a year ago the Treasury Department requested of the Appropriations Committee authority for employing 1,200 additional men. They were then collecting about $35,000,000 a month on back taxes. They said if we are given 1,200 additional men we will be able to add to the $35,000,000 a month perhaps another $100,000,000 a year in back tax collections. They said if they were able to audit the corporation schedules as rapidly as they thought they might it would be possible for them to increase the income from back taxes from $500,000,000 to $550,000,000. The committee only allowed them 600 men, because the committee believed from investigation that they could not assimilate 1,200 men; that under the best circumstances possible they might assimilate 100 men a month. It has turned out that they have not been able to assimilate the number of men that they anticipated monthly, even to the 600.

It is a very interesting situation in connection with the settlement of tax accounts. Some of these corporation schedules have so many documents connected with them that it takes a truck or two to carry the schedules for one corporation. We are told that the most expert men they have in the audit service can audit not to exceed 15 of these schedules in a year. So that it is going to take some time to audit all of the schedules back to 1917 before we know how much we have due on underpaid schedules.

It is fair to say that in the consideration of problems affecting tax payments, when schedules are made those who make them claim exemption from certain charges imposed under the law, and until the adjustment of these conditions between the department and the taxpayer are made, nobody knows how much the Government is going to get. It frequently happens that where the taxpayer makes a claim for a refund, when it comes to an audit he owes the Government; and it frequently happens that where the taxpayer is claimed to have underpaid, the audit will show an overpayment. The audit is going along as rapidly as it can under the circumstances, but it will be two or three years, in my judgment, before the corporation schedules will all be audited, although the present schedules are now current. I thought it might be interesting to say this much in view of the fact that we are recommending an appropriation of $28,000,000 for the refund of taxes.

We are recommending an item of $271,000 for the Capitol power plant. The Capitol, the House Office Building, the Library, and the Senate Office Building are all heated and lighted and operated from the central power plant under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol. The Architect of the Capitol says that the boilers in the plant are obsolete. A test of those boilers has recently been made, and the inspector of boilers says that the boilers are unsafe. The same thing is true of the Government Printing Office boilers in their plant. The Government Printing Office supplies power, light, and heat to the city post office and to operate its own plant besides. The committee decided after careful investigation to transfer all the power plant required by the Government Printing Office and the city post office to the central power plant under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol. That will obviate the necessity of the renewal of the battery of boilers at the Government Printing Office, and will transfer to one control all the expense incident to the operation of all the buildings on the Hill, including the Government Printing Office and the city post office. It is a very important recommendation that we make here, one about which there should be no question, because it is vital, I may say, that these plants should be renewed.

Another important item, although a small amount, $20,000, is in connection with the inspection of buildings of the District. There never has been a sufficient number of building inspectors allowed the city government to properly conduct the building inspection of the city, and now at this period, when there is more building than ever before, it is specially important that proper inspection should be had, and so we allow $20,000, the amount recommended by the District Commissioners. I believe if they had had proper building inspection at the time the Knickerbocker building was erected there would never have been a disaster.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Does the evidence before the inquest show any warrant for such a statement?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. They had an inspector there for the Knickerbocker building, did they not?

Mr. MADDEN. They did not have a sufficient number to do the work.

Mr. BEGG. How many inspectors do they need?

Mr. MADDEN. They would want but one for that building, but one inspector can not properly inspect a building if he had a hundred more to look after. You must have a sufficient number of inspectors to go around and see the buildings that are being erected at least once every day or two.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL. I made a very thorough canvass of that matter after the Knickerbocker Theater disaster and I found out that last summer one inspector was taking care of the inspection of 400 buildings in the District. That was the condition at the time the Knickerbocker Theater was constructed and the condition last year.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, that is an impossible state of affairs. The Patent Office sant notice out to patentees throughout the country that unless they had an appropriation of $30,000 made available before the 1st of July they would not be able after the 1st of July to send out the printed, bound patents that are issued, and the Director of the Patent Office says that if they do not send the patents out in that form on the dates set many of these patents are invalid. I want the public to know that we have recommended the total amount to the Patent Office which the Director of Patents himself was able to prove is necessary, $27,453.03, instead of $30,000 which he asked.

Some time since, I do not know how long, perhaps a couple of years, there was authorized the erection of the Eastern High School in the District. There was a limit of cost fixed upon the erection of the building. That limit of cost is exceeded, largely because those who have charge probably paid very little or no attention to the amount of money at their disposal, and they erected a building the cost of which was much greater than the amount allowed. The building is now in process of construction. It will be completed, ready for occupancy next December. It will have a capacity for 1,500 students, but the building will not be complete without equipment or janitors or engineers, and they have not a dollar with which to supply equipment. Therefore we have recommended here $260,000 for equipment and service in order that when the building is complete it will be at the disposal of the children who are now unable to attend school because of the lack of facilities.

The General Accounting Office came before the committee and requested an appropriation of $92,500. The proposal was based upon the intention of the General Accounting Office to audit the Shipping Board books. The evidence presented to the committee did not indicate that the audit which they proposed would be very comprehensive, and finally, after careful study of the problem in consultation with the Comptroller General, we induced him to make a further study of the question for which he asked the money in order that a more comprehensive audit than he proposed might be entered into, and pending that study we declined to give him what he asked. This question will probably come up at some future day.

In 1921 the Congress authorized loans to be made to farmers for seed in Montana and North Dakota and Idaho, and I think one or two others of those Northern States. The loans made were about 13,000 in number and amounted to $1,950,000. Notes were taken for these loans from the persons to whom the loans were made and security was given on the 1921 crop. Out of the $1,950,000 loaned, $700,000 was collected and new notes in some cases have been taken. No renewed security has been taken in any case. This spring—1922—Congress authorized loans to the amount of $1,500,000 for this same purpose in that same region. Those loans have been made and security has been taken on the 1922 crop. That makes $2,750,000 in loans outstanding. The Agricultural Department thought it wise to begin a campaign for the collection of the money due on those notes. They outlined to the committee the character of campaign they would make. The committee made several suggestions about what they thought should be done. They believed that if they were given money with which to pay those who were to make the campaign, employees of the department, of course, they would be able to collect during this summer on these loans $500,000. They asked for $50,000. If they get nothing there will probably be nothing paid. The committee thought it would be a good investment to give $50,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture to make this campaign of collection, not only because of the amount of money that would follow the campaign into the Treasury of the United States but because it would indicate to those who borrowed the money from the Government that the Government expected to have it paid back, and it would make for better citizenship to let them understand that the money was a loan and not a gift. Therefore we have recommended an appropriation of $50,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture, who is to use it for the purpose of making collections under the circumstances I have just described.

We come now to the Interior Department, the Pension Office. Some time since the Congress passed an act which authorized the payment of pensions to Civil War and other veterans every 30 days instead of every 90 days. That involves an expenditure of nearly $500,000 as we gathered the facts, and it makes necessary the appointment of 151 more people in the Pension Office at a cost of $211,830 as the committee recommends it, but at a cost of $233,400 as the Pension Office recommends it. We gave them all the men they wanted, but we did not fix the pay as they desired, and we find ourselves with an economy of $21,570 on account of recommending a different list of salaries to the people to be employed. Contingent expenses, such as desks and supplies of all kinds, amount to $45,875 in connection with that same matter. Further on we were compelled to make a recommendation for an appropriation to the Treasurer of the United States on account of this, because while to-day under the present system 550,000 checks are sent out every 90 days, under the new system which must be put into force before the 1st of September there will be 550,000 checks a month sent out.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I notice in the bill here that in the $1,200 grade you have 84 clerks. They asked for 60 and they asked for 5 supervising clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and we gave them three. The reason why we gave them only three was this: They have 150 people attending to this business now and they have 3 supervisors, and they are going to put on only 150 more, but they wanted 5 additional supervisors. We could not understand that. As a matter of fact, I think that the three supervisors that they have now could do the work, but I think they were perfectly satisfied that three additional supervisors could do the work. We did not want to cripple them, so we gave them three, against my judgment. I do not think they ought to have any. When you commence to put supervisors on top of supervisors and subsupervisors on top of subsupervisors, and you have a supervisor in this department over every five persons who are working, and there are so many things that the supervisor has to do that somebody else must do for him, then it gets to be kind of monotonous, putting these fellows one on top of the other with somebody else to do the work.

I am very heartily in favor of seeing this work properly done and of employing people at a rate of wage where they will not need somebody to wait on them, instead of employing too many at such a rate of wage they will need two servants, one on each side of them.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the gentleman yield for one more question, if he will bear with me?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand they have asked for 35 clerks over there at $1,600 each?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they did.

Mr. THOMPSON. And the gentleman gave them 15 at $1,500 each?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they have now. There is no reason why we should give them 35 for the additional 150 when they have 15 for the first 150. Why should they want 35 supervisors for the additional 150 when we only have 15 for the 150 now there?

Mr. THOMPSON. The law of Congress, as they claim, has increased the work so they must have these.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not blame the gentleman for being an advocate of the Pension Bureau, because it is a very interesting bureau to some of our friends. I like the people down there very well myself, but I am not in favor of playing favorites anywhere. If we are going to have to put a lot of extra people to do the work, I want the people put on to do the work and not sit around watching their fellows every day.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman went into the question pretty thoroughly as to the relative number that should be in the various grades?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. McKENZIE. And feel you have it properly balanced?

Mr. MADDEN. I feel absolutely certain we have; that is, we have it so balanced that it will work. Now, we have in the Postal Service a recommendation for $1,500,000 for domestic-mail indemnities, and I wish to say that it is in connection with losses on registered mail.

The revenue from this source is about $9,000,000 a year. The expenditures up to this time have aggregated about $4,000,000. There are about 30,000 unadjusted claims pending, all of which it is expected will be adjusted between now and the 1st of July. I have already explained that $28,122,500 is for the return of income taxes illegally collected. We have had application for two or three very large items that the committee did not allow. One was for $650,000 for the construction of an addition to the leprosarium in Louisiana. There we have a leprosarium accommodating 200 leprosy cases. They say they have applications for admission to this institution of 135 more. There are some 1,100 or 1,200 cases throughout the United States, and they are unable to accommodate them, but the committee had no jurisdiction to make the allowance if they had the disposition to make it, because that is a matter for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There was one other item that the committee did not allow. That is a reimbursement to Louis Leavitt of $620,623.33. This is the case where the man, on the advertisement of the Government of the United States, bid for the purchase of 2,800,000 pounds of bacon. The contract was awarded on June 15, 1919. The contract provided that deliveries would be made upon his order at any time after the contract was signed. The evidence before the committee showed that no sale was made of the bacon purchased on June 15, except $20,000 worth, up to October 27, 1919. Between June 15, 1919, and October 27, 1919, you gentleman will recall we were passing resolutions in the House urging the Secretary of War to dispose of the surplus food supplies of the country to the people who were unable to buy them at decent prices. It was contended that between the period of June 15, 1919, and October 27, 1919, Mr. Leavitt could have sold this bacon. He paid the United States about $620,000, or maybe more; yes, $720,000, and had $100,000 paid back to him because of the quantity that he bought not having been delivered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Bought it from the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. From the Government. No orders, as I understand, were given by Mr. Leavitt to the Government for shipment of the bacon that he purchased until September. I may be wrong about that, and I do not want to do an injustice. But in September one million eight hundred and some odd thousand pounds, and later on 400,000 pounds more, were shipped to Mr. Leavitt to New York to a cold-storage warehouse he designated and was held there as his property.

On the 27th of October the district attorney for the eastern district of New York decided that Mr. Leavitt had been hoarding food supplies and began prosecution of Mr. Leavitt under the food control act. They had him indicted, and he was indicted five times. He was tried, and he was acquitted. Then the bacon had deteriorated, and he finally was compelled to sell it for about 3 or 4 cents a pound, whereas he paid 28§ cents a pound for it. Then he made claim for the difference of what he sold the bacon at and what he paid for it, and the Secretary of War made an award in his favor for the amount of $620,623.33. When he went down for payment the Comptroller General held that there was no money there with which to pay. This was certified to the Committee on Appropriations for payment. Our investigation led us to this conclusion: First, we concluded that if Mr. Leavitt wanted to sell this bacon between June 15 and October 27, he could have sold it; that it was his property and subject to his order at any time, and if it deteriorated after that it was none of our business. But that was not all. We reached the conclusion, after some inquiries of the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, who is the attorney for the Army, and asked him this question finally in the consideration of the problem: If the Government had the money in the Treasury, or the War Department had the money in the Treasury, out of which this claim could be paid on the day the award was made, was there any law on the statute books under which the War Department would have the authority to make the payment? He said there was not, and that it required legislative action.

That being the case, there was nothing for our committee to do but to reject the recommendation on the ground that it was a claim and not properly before our committee. I think that was our conclusion, was it not, Mr. BYRNS? And so we rejected the claim.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Has the gentleman made a statement with reference to the item of $3,000,000 and a little over beginning on page 17 of the bill? I was called out of the Chamber.

Mr. MADDEN. Was that in regard to the certified accounts?

Mr. HOCH. It was in regard to the settlement of claims.

Mr. MADDEN. During the war many things happened connected with the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I will use two or three more minutes. During the war, of course, we had many things that we had to do, many things impossible of ascertainment. We found in the War Department obligations existing everywhere, the vouchers for which did not come down and could not be reached. Perhaps the claims were in dispute.

Mr. HOCH. These are claims, apparently, of foreign Governments and nationals for service furnished the American service abroad.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about another matter altogether. I am talking about claims.

Mr. HOCH. I am speaking of the items on page 17. What is the nature of the claims? I think there are about $3,200,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Those are cases where, for example, during the war certain obligations were incurred between the United States and the French Government and other Governments, settlement for which was authorized by an act later on. Adjudication of these cases is proceeding from time to time, and has not yet been completed, and can not be completed until some time in 1923. That classification amounts to $1,103,000. And then the $2,100,000 goes to make up the $3,203,000, and comes about like this: During the war the United States Government entered into a contract with England that during the war—that is, during the period for which England was in the war—she would pay all the royalties to patentees of English airplanes for all planes used by the United States as well as England, and after the war we would have to meet our own obligations for patents that we used.

The English Government declared peace some time in 1919. We did not declare peace until 1921; that is, the proclamation was not issued until 1921. Between 1919 and 1921 we were compelled to pay for all the patent rights on engine parts that we used that belonged to the English patentees. Up to that time England paid it all. The total cost of the entire use of these patents, I think, ran up to about $50,000,000. Our liability was limited to 4 per cent, which amounts to $2,000,000, and all this is under contract between the United States and England. First, England wanted the United States to have these cases adjudicated in the English courts. The United States refused to do that, but the United States did enter into a contract with England to arbitrate between our officials and theirs.

Mr. HOCH. Is there anything in that contract which prevents this debt from being set off against the debt of England to the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. This stands by itself.

Mr. HOCH. It must stand by itself, and there is no disposition to set off these claims against the claims we may have against foreign nations?

Mr. MADDEN. We have no liability since the close of the war. England paid about $48,000,000.

Mr. HOCH. This provision apparently extends the Dent Act?

Mr. MADDEN. It does not; but it does this, namely, it extends the period for which a certain amount of money is available under the Dent Act. There is $60,000,000 now available in the War Department, all of which will be covered into the Treasury on the 30th of June, but it does extend a part of that money, but not the act.

Mr. HOCH. But no part of that money could be expended for the payment of claims of this country?

Mr. MADDEN. There are no claims of this country. This just extends the contracts——

Mr. HOCH. This specifically extends the act of March 2, 1919, up to 1923?

Mr. MADDEN. It extends the date of the use of the money.

Mr. HOCH. It extends it only for that purpose?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and all the rest of the money will be covered into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12090) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 211 Members had answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted a list of the absentees for entry in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, will he yield to me for one minute?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. LINTHICUM, of Maryland, at the Key memorial exercises on June 16, 1922, at Fort McHenry, and I ask that it be inserted in the regular CONGRESSIONAL RECORD type.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the address of his colleague [Mr. LINTHICUM] referred to be printed in the RECORD in the regular 8-point type. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

"President Harding, Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, this event marks an occasion I long have anticipated—the erection of this beautiful memorial to that undaunted, courageous, and distinguished Marylander, Francis Scott Key, author of the Star Spangled Banner, our national anthem, and to the soldiers and sailors who took part in the Battle of North Point and the defense of Fort McHenry.

"It was my pleasure, at the request of the Star Spangled Banner Centennial Commission, to introduce in the House of Representatives a bill providing for the erection of such a monument. Through the splendid work and cooperation of the Hon. John Walter Smith and our other colleagues in Congress an item of $75,000 for the erection of this memorial at Fort McHenry was provided in the urgent deficiency bill and approved by the President on July 29, 1914. According to the terms provided in that bill, James H. Preston, then mayor of Baltimore; Dr. A. B. Bibbins, president of the Star Spangled Banner Centennial Commission; George Weems Williams, president of the park board; John Walter Smith, Senator from Maryland; and myself constituted an advisory commission, with the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, representing the Secretary of War, and Joseph Evans Sperry, architect, Ephraim Keyser, sculptor, and Douglas H. Thomas, jr., architect, were constituted advisors to the commission.

"In April, 1916, competitive designs for a monument and submission of models was asked, and out of 100 applicants 34 submitted models, which were on exhibition at the National Museum in the city of Washington. This advisory commission, with the able assistance of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, Gen. William W. Harts, the predecessor of our distinguished friend, Lieut. Col. C. O. Sherrill, after much deliberation and mature thought, recommended to the Secretary of War the adoption of the beautiful monument which you see before you to-day—the work of Charles L. Niehaus, the talented sculptor, who has been so diligent and so earnest in having it perfect in every detail. There is no monument in this or any other country more accurate than this.

"The monument stands for more than those ordinarily erected in that it represents the appreciation of the entire people through the National Government for the accomplishment of Francis Scott Key in the writing of the Star Spangled Banner, and of the soldiers and sailors who so valiantly fought for the defense of our city and country. There are other monuments to that celebrated citizen, but none which bears the imprint, the approval, and which has been erected by an appropriation of the National Government except this. The Government has established in marble and bronze a monument to the man whose memory has been carried in the loving hearts of his fellow countrymen, and to those valiant sons of the war. It represents in concrete form the love and admiration of the people of this great Republic through an act of Congress and the approval of the President of the United States.

"This strong Nation, comprised as it is of 110,000,000 people, with great wealth and powerful influence, with the respect and admiration of the entire world, with innumerable victories to its credit, not alone upon its own soil, but upon the battle fields of foreign nations, is to-day at the head of the countries of the world, and it is difficult to realize that at the time of the War of 1812 it was struggling for existence—a country then divided in sentiment over the declaration and prosecution of that war. Another well-known citizen of our State, William Pinkney, then Attorney General of the United States under President James Madison, had written the declaration of war which Congress had enacted and the President approved on the 18th day of June, 1812.

"Our armies were fighting under serious difficulties for the country's very existence; our land was invaded from the north by troops mobilizing at Plattsburg and ordered to proceed down Lake Champlain; and in the south a naval force, under Admiral Cochrane, which had mobilized at Bermuda, had arrived in the Chesapeake Bay and begun hostilities. It was believed that a junction of these forces was intended. The Capital of the Nation had surrendered and the public buildings lay in ruins, a terrible desecration which struck terror into the hearts of the people. With these victories and their natural exhilaration upon the enemy's troops, they proceeded to Baltimore. The land troops disembarked down the river and met their defeat at the Battle of North Point, General Ross, their commander, losing his life in the advance. It was natural for them to expect, with their powerful army and great battleships of that day, with their seasoned troops fresh from the Napoleonic wars, where success had not long since perched upon their banners, that they would crush the little Republic resting insecurely on this side of the Atlantic, and the mere opposition of a city like Baltimore, then composed of only a few thousand population, was a matter very immaterial to them, indeed.

"They had not, however, calculated upon the spirit and valor of the men of America; they had not taken into calculation the fact that our people were fighting for home and loved ones, nor had they considered that the independence which had been secured in 1783 would never be easily relinquished nor its purposes abandoned; it was never ordained to be so. They could not comprehend that the men fighting for America under our form of government were the controlling factors of America; they were America militant. The enemy therefore sailed boldly up to this little fort and began their bombardment, while the land troops fought at North Point—both confident of success.

"Francis Scott Key, desiring to procure the release of a prisoner friend, was on the deck of the British flagship Minden, just in yonder harbor. All night long he paced the deck of that battleship. We can well imagine how he longed for the morning to come, how he watched 'the rockets' red glare' and heard 'the bombs bursting in air,' and how wearily the hours passed. At last, peering through the mists of that memorable morning, he saw in the distance his country's flag proudly and defiantly waving from yonder staff, where our flag to-day peacefully unfurls its colors. He was inspired with patriotic fervor to write those stirring lines:

"The Star Spangled Banner, oh long may it wave,
"O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

"There are millions to-day who sing our national anthem which has made Key's name immortal and has written in letters of gold the deeds of those brave soldiers and sailors. Many, however, do not realize that the crushing repulse of the enemy at Fort McHenry was a victory of the utmost strategic value to our Nation at the most critical period in its history, when encouragement was so greatly needed. It was not only the most spectacular engagement of the war of 1812, but the spirit of Americans aroused and awakened by that victory, and the song which it inspired, stirred the patriotic blood of the people in every State of our Union. It furnished the most dramatic chapter of an intensely bitter war. Tidings of the battle of North Point were followed rapidly by details of the death of General Ross, commander of the enemy's forces; details of the fierce and dramatic attack on Fort McHenry, and the complete repulse of the enemy were soon corroborated by Key's inspiring anthem, which met with tremendous popularity. As by magic, our people were aroused and our Government infused with the vigor and vitality of an awakened national life. The victory at Fort McHenry, so well pictured by Key's inspired lines, was a stimulus to the patriotic impulses of the Nation, which worked a wonder little short of miraculous in rejuvenating our national spirit; there was infused into the hearts and minds of our people a determination to fight until success was assured. It should be written along with the great battles of the world, not alone for the fighting spirit but for the culminating effect it brought about for all time to come.

"We have great wealth in manufacturing industries in the North and New England States, giving employment and feeding millions of our population—an empire in itself—but that does not constitute a nation; to the south we have the great plantations with their industrious and thriving people, with the numerous cities and towns, and all the luxuries necessary for human existence, but that does not make a nation; to the west we have the great fields of golden grain, wealth of mines, and a vast acreage of wonderful plains and towering mountains, but that does not constitute a nation; on the great Pacific slope we have the many cities busy with their various enterprises, the gold mines and beautiful orange groves, as well as fruit of every kind, but that does not constitute a nation; nor does the combination of all these great industries, wealth, and so forth, constitute a nation.

"It requires something more—a consolidating and vitalizing influence which draws the hearts and minds of the people to a common purpose, a common country, a common cause, instilling into them a patriotism not born of wealth but of inspiration. Thus did the anthem written by Francis Scott Key make the whole Nation as one man, with the power and wealth of a nation back of it, and soon brought the war to a final conclusion.

"When tales of that battle were carried back to London it was not long before our commissioners were able to negotiate peace, and the treaty of Ghent was signed on the 24th of December, 1814. The official messengers arrived in New York on February 11, 1815, but before they could reach Washington Christopher Hughes, jr., of Baltimore, secretary to the commission, who sailed direct for the Chesapeake on the Transit, landed at Annapolis bearing the glad tidings. His remains rest in the same tomb with his brother-in-law, Colonel Armistead, the defender of Fort McHenry, in old St. Paul's graveyard in this city.

"To-day we honor ourselves in honoring these men who mean so much in the history of our country. To-day we stand upon hallowed ground and, in the presence of our Chief Executive and this vast concourse of true American citizens, rededicate ourselves to the service of our country and determine to emulate those to whom we now dedicate this beautiful monument."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Chair to notify me at the end of 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for half a minute?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the Members that we hope to get through with general debate at about 7 o'clock, but we shall remain in session until the general debate is concluded.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], as he always does, has made a very clear and comprehensive explanation with reference to the pending bill, and it is not my purpose to enter into any particular discussion of it.

This bill carries $40,043,102.31. Of that sum about $1,370,535 is for deficiencies for the year 1921 and previous years. The bill carries, as has been stated, $28,122,500 for refund of taxes to those who have made overpayments. It carries an appropriation of $4,420,293.89 for judgments and claims, and about $967,000 for the year 1923. The remainder of the appropriation is for deficiencies for the current fiscal year.

The bill also carries, as has been explained, reappropriations out of unexpended balances of more than $3,200,000, so that it makes available for the purposes set forth in the bill $43,250,000 in round numbers.

I am in favor of this bill. I think the committee has reduced it to the very greatest extent possible. I shall vote for it, because it is necessary to supply the various deficiencies of this year and also to take care of some of the obligations of the Government for the next year which were not provided for in the regular annual appropriation bills which were passed and which will become effective on July 1.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then all of this appropriation is really not for deficiencies?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. Not all of it is for deficiencies; as I explained, it has nearly a million dollars for 1923. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in his discussion of the bill explained the various items that go to make up that sum.

The question might be raised in the minds of some, and especially in the mind of the general public, which gets its information from the newspapers and which has read the various statements which have been issued with so much regularity by the Director of the Budget as to the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars, as to just why, if that be true, it has been necessary to make a deficiency appropriation to take care of deficiencies for this year. As a matter of fact, this is the fourth deficiency bill that has been passed. The first deficiency bill was passed in August last, which carried $50,500,000, in round numbers. Another deficiency bill was put through in December. That bill carried $105,207,000, in round numbers. Another deficiency bill was put through in March of this year, which carried $137,245,000, making a total in those three bills of $293,079,413.51. Then, you will recall that Congress by a special resolution passed an appropriation of $500,000 to enable the Attorney General to prosecute the war profiteers, and Congress also appropriated by special resolution $12,000,000 under the authorization for new hospitals, and this bill, as I say, carries something over $40,000,000, which makes $345,622,516.82 appropriated by way of deficiencies for this year.

Now, I submit that that is a very large deficiency appropriation to be passed in any one fiscal year, especially in the face of the repeated declarations and statements of the Director of the Budget that he is saving so much to the Treasury and to the people of the United States since the Budget went into operation. Clearly he is not saving it by reducing the appropriations made by Congress. Clearly he has not cut out any expenditures which were authorized by Congress and for which appropriations were made.

Now, if he means by his statements that he has prevented some bureau or some department from making expenditures not authorized and not appropriated for by Congress, then possibly he may be correct in some measure, although any such statement would be largely speculative. But that, if really true, and I question it, is not a saving. The mere fact that some bureau has not spent more money than Congress said a year ago that it should spend during the fiscal year does not entitle the head of that bureau or the head of the Budget to say that a saving has been made, because that bureau might have spent more As a matter of fact, no department head, no head of a bureau, has the right to create a deficiency, and if they do so they are liable under the law and subject to a penalty of fine and imprisonment.

So I repeat that the mere fact that we have appropriated during this year over $345,000,000 by way of supplementing the appropriations made in the regular annual appropriation bills for this year is a clear refutation of any statement that has been made in the past on the part of the Director of the Budget that there has been a saving under the operation of the Budget in the real, true sense of the word "saving."

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman explain how it is possible for the heads of these bureaus to have deficiencies if they are held under the law to only use the amount of money that is appropriated for a particular purpose. That is what I can not understand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to conclude my remarks, and so I will answer the gentleman briefly. It has been the custom in the past for departments to create deficiencies, but in many cases they are in violation of the statute the gentleman refers to. I am happy to say that the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has served notice on the departments and heads of bureaus that in the future they will have to show some real reason, some genuine reason, some important reason, for creating a deficiency or they will not get by with an appropriation, because they are to be held to the appropriations made by Congress, and if Congress does not assert its right to insist on their staying within the appropriations it results that the heads of the departments or the heads of the bureaus make the appropriations instead of the appropriating body.

Mr. STEPHENS. Are not these deficiencies illegal?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Some of them may be in a strict sense. There are deficiencies that can be created in a perfectly legal manner, and while many may not bear close inspection so far as the legality is concerned, they may have been necessary.

The gentleman from Illinois has referred to an appropriation carried in the bill of $50,000 to enable the Agricultural Department to collect on the account due the Government for advances made to certain farmers in Montana, the two Dakotas, Idaho, and Washington for the purchase of seeds. Gentlemen will recollect that Congress last year appropriated $2,000,000, and those who advocated the appropriation said there was no question about its being repaid, because it was to be a first lien on the crops. After earnest and persistent effort the Agricultural Department has only collected up to date $700,000, of a total loan of $1,960,000, $30,000 having been used for administration purposes; but they say that if this appropriation is made and they are permitted to employ persons to personally intercede and personally see these debtors that possibly they will be able to collect from $300,000 to $500,000. In other words, the department states that under no circumstances do they expect to be able to collect more than $1,200,000.

Mr. LAYTON. This is an appropriation of $50,000 more to collect on an expectation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely, and yet I feel that the $50,000 ought to be appropriated because it is clear that unless you appropriate the money and send a representative to these debtors who will personally endeavor to collect these debts, I am satisfied, and the department is satisfied, that they will not be able to collect any more than has been collected.

In addition, Congress appropriated a million and a half dollars this year for the same purpose, and $1,460,000 has been loaned up to this time. It is due next October, and, judging by experience of last year, I take it that not more than 50 per cent will ever be repaid to the Treasury. How long is Congress going to continue to make that character of appropriations and give away the people's money? [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, more than two months ago I called the attention of Congress to extensive violations of the Federal corrupt practices act by the Anti-Saloon League.

Immediately thereafter I laid conclusive and sworn proof in support of my charges before the Department of Justice.

I took my charges and my evidence to the Department of Justice because I believed, as I do now, that the Congress is utterly subservient to the prohibition minority in this country and that any hope at present there might be of remedying the intolerable domination of Congress by the Anti-Saloon League must come from the executive and not the legislative branch.

Twelve weeks have elapsed and the evidence has not been presented to a grand jury.

I wish to reiterate my charges now. My reason for so doing are these:

The Federal Government through inaction is condoning violations of the Federal corrupt practices act.

Now, I am reliably informed that the offenses against the Federal corrupt practices act are to be repeated in the forthcoming elections.

The Anti-Saloon League in a recently issued statement, signed by Wayne B. Wheeler, William H. Anderson, and another, contends that it is not obligated to make any returns to Washington for the receipts and expenditures relating to elections of its State subsidiaries, which are its real operating agencies. Very few of the States impose requirements of their own.

The end of this session of Congress is approaching. I have here before me evidence that 11 of the State subsidiaries of the Anti-Saloon League are proposing to support with their influence and their money the Representative from the seventh Minnesota congressional district.

The Literary Digest, a most reputable publication, June 17 current, page 13, states:

> The dry forces, on the other hand, with 20 or more organizations and a $2,000,000 fund, are out to keep dry Senators and Representatives in Washington and to add to their number, if possible. Already they have announced their antagonism to Senator CALDER, of New York, who expects to be reelected this fall, but have intimated that Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt would be acceptable.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not. I continue to read from the Literary Digest:

> Representatives of 11 States, meeting in Milwaukee, at the Anti-Saloon League conference, united in promising their aid to Congressman VOLSTEAD this fall.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wish simply to ask the gentleman to state the date of that Literary Digest.

Mr. TINKHAM. June 17 current. Here again we have the outrageous situation about which I have protested. Here again we have the Anti-Saloon League, dependent upon the Representative of the seventh Minnesota district for its intended further restrictions of the personal liberties of our people, proposing to purchase that preferential treatment it has received heretofore by supporting with money a campaign for reelection of the Representative from the seventh Minnesota district.

If we are going to have prohibition let us prohibit this insidious evil, more inimical to the foundations of our Government than the greatest abuse of liquor ever was.

Before this Congress adjourns it should place upon the statute books a law making it a crime for any person, corporation, association, or organization interested in the passage or repeal of any legislation of whatsoever character to purchase it by spending money for the election of men who will favor their selfish interests or their particular or peculiar legislative ideas.

Great denunciation has been leveled at a certain Senator from Michigan for excessive expenditure of money for his election, but the money was not contributed by those seeking legislation.

Certain criticism has been made of a candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania because of large contributions of his own to his personal campaign fund.

I hold no brief for the defense of either Mr. NEWBERRY or Mr. Pinchot. They are capable of defending themselves. However, neither of these men is under any legislative obligation to anyone because of these expenditures and contributions, and in their offices they are free to exercise their power in accordance with the public interest. But what shall be said of a Member of the Senate or a Member of the House of Representatives whose political bills are paid not by himself but by others who are seeking legislation through him?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to charge that Members are doing that?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order, and move that his words be taken down. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will not. The words may be taken down.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I think that is the only way to get any effect, by having them taken down.

Mr. TINKHAM. By a competent——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I make the point of order that the gentleman must take his seat when the motion is made to take down his words.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question before the Chair is whether the gentleman's words are out of order. I claim they are not.

The CHAIRMAN. The words are being taken down by the Clerk.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman charges Members with graft by having their campaign funds paid by some interest that he has mentioned in order that they may have their bills enacted into law.

Mr. TINKHAM. I have sworn evidence to verify my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the question of order is determined.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I make the point of order that the gentleman must take his seat.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take it that there is a preliminary matter to be decided by the Chair: First, as to whether the words are out of order. Otherwise, any Member of the House could rise and say that a gentleman is out of order when his words were clearly in order, and thereby interrupt the whole legislative proceedings of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words that are demanded to be taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

> But what shall be said of a Member of the Senate or a Member of the House of Representatives whose political bills are paid not by himself but by others, who are seeking legislation through him.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made that the gentleman is proceeding out of order. The Chair fails to see in the words that have been read to the committee anything that violates any rules of the House that are known to the Chair. No specific mention is made of any particular Member. The statement is a general one, and it seems to the Chair it is one that the gentleman has a right to make in the course of debate. The point of order is, therefore, overruled, and the gentleman will proceed in order. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, by a competent legal decision bribery has been defined to be "the giving to another anything of value or any valuable services intending to influence him in the discharge of some legal duty."

Notwithstanding this decision and definition it would be difficult, in fact impossible, to convict a Member of the Senate or a Member of the House of Representatives of being bribed because he received a contribution for campaign purposes or had his political expenses paid by an individual, corporation, or association interested in the passage of legislation or preventing the repeal of legislation.

Yet this form of bribery is insidious and poisonous in the highest degree, and in this age and country it is a more depraved, vicious, and dissolute type of that evil than the world has ever known, because its corruption is so universal and it is conducted upon such a vast scale.

To abolish this corruption, which, if allowed to continue, will destroy all government and all respect for law made under such influences, I have introduced a bill the provisions of which are as follows:

> That it shall be unlawful for any individual or corporation or for any organization, association, society, committee, league, or other body of persons organized or incorporated under any name or title whatever, whether for social, political, religious, fraternal, scientific, or any other purpose, to make a money contribution or equivalent to a candidate or to a committee supporting a candidate, or to use, promise, loan, advance, or expend any money or its equivalent in behalf of a candidate or to a committee supporting a candidate in connection with any election in two or more States at which Representatives in Congress and Members of the United States Senate are to be elected, if and when such individual, corporation, organization, association, society, committee, league, or other body of persons shall be seeking, advocating, promoting, or proposing the enactment of legislation by the Congress of the United States—
> With a penalty not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or both.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not yield.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I think the gentleman ought to yield.

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members are present, a quorum. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this bill I desire to bring to the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives some astounding facts which show the absolute necessity for the passage of such legislation as I have proposed and the passage of further legislation requiring that all organizations engaged in political propaganda or seeking legislation or the repeal of legislation shall be incorporated and a detailed publication of their receipts and expenditures filed here in Washington yearly.

I have selected the highly paid professional Federal lobbyist, Wayne B. Wheeler, and his propaganda organization, the Anti-Saloon League of America and its subsidiaries organized in every State of the Union, after careful investigation because his and its practices best illustrate the evils which should be abolished. Also, because Wayne B. Wheeler came before the subcommittee on the State and Justice Departments appropriation bills of the Appropriation Committee last March, of which I am a member, and under cross-examination made certain disclosures which lead to the finding of much incriminating evidence in relation to many violations of the corrupt practices act of June 25, 1910, by Wayne B. Wheeler and his organization, which evidence is now before the Department of Justice for prosecution.

The act of June 25, 1910, requires two returns of money received and money expended to be made in Washington before an election and one after an election by the "national committees of all political parties and all committees, associations, or organizations which shall in two or more States influence the result or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected."

Wayne B. Wheeler and the part of his propaganda organization known as the Anti-Saloon League of America for the first time in 1920 filed a return of its receipts and expenditures but did not comply with other requirements of the statute. Only six State subsidiaries filed returns, all not in conformity with the law.

The returns of the Anti-Saloon League of America, the national propaganda organization, were signed and sworn to by Wayne B. Wheeler, who in signing called himself, "Treasurer, campaign committee, Anti-Saloon League of America."

In the first return signed and sworn to by Wayne B. Wheeler, dated October 22, 1920, and in the second return filed October 29, 1920, he asserts that some of the money spent in the numerous congressional districts mentioned in these returns was spent in the seventh district of Minnesota.

No return in accordance with the law was filed in Washington by the Anti-Saloon League of Minnesota, a subsidiary of the Anti-Saloon League of America, although the Anti-Saloon League of Wisconsin, an adjacent State, and also a subsidiary of the Anti-Saloon League of America, filed one return in Washington of political expenditures amounting to $10,028.83, and it is common report that a much larger sum than this was spent by the Anti-Saloon League of Minnesota.

The Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, represents the seventh congressional district of Minnesota.

Wayne B. Wheeler knew that he was going before a committee of Congress of which the Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, was chairman, for legislation or to prevent the repeal of legislation, and as a matter of fact, appeared for legislation. When Wayne B. Wheeler appeared before the Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, could the Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW

J. VOLSTEAD, refuse such legislative demands and exactions as insisted upon by Wayne B. Wheeler, and, if so, to what extent? In what position was the Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, between the interests of his country, the maintenance of its Constitution and all its parts, and his obligations to Wayne B. Wheeler?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to refer to the gentleman from Minnesota except as the gentleman from Minnesota, other than by his name.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have referred to him carefully as the Representative from Minnesota, ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD, which is in proper parliamentary form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe that the language referred to by the gentleman from Texas is out of order or violates any rule of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. When Wayne B. Wheeler appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress favoring restrictions more drastic than those contained in the original Volstead Act, he had violated the Federal corrupt practices act. He or another employee of the Anti-Saloon League had committed perjury, and the evidence is now before the Department of Justice for prosecution. He was a legislative corruptionist.

I challenge him to sue me for libel, and I promise to waive any immunity I may have as a Member of Congress, if what I have just stated is untrue. He dare not face a court of law where he will be compelled to tell the truth. His very presence in the Capitol is an offense against decency. With him there is the incarnation of invisible government and the rule of the power of money.

Wayne B. Wheeler has systematically and on a wholesale plan subsidized in the way indicated in the case of the Representative from Minnesota Members of Congress and concealed the facts by not complying with the act of June 25, 1910, until the election of 1920, and then only complying with the act in small part and under a written protest, stating that his organization was not a political organization.

These facts can not be denied and their moral obliquity defended.

Notwithstanding the adoption of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution in 1918 and the Volstead Act in 1919 and the constant denial by Mr. Wheeler and many officials of his propaganda organization that they had not been engaged in or are not now engaged in political action or participating directly in elections and are not subject to the corrupt practices acts, the following facts show these statements to be unqualifiedly false.

Under date of September 29, 1921, William H. Anderson, State superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, sent a circular letter which reads in part as follows:

> The nation-wide financial stringency has hit your agency for protecting and promoting the enforcement of prohibition. Unless we have $25,000 quickly part of the organization it has taken years to build must be dropped and some of our expert staff it has taken years to develop must be allowed to go. If this happens we may not be able to hold the line in New York against the certain wet drive next year for wet Congressmen in dry districts and a wet governor and legislature to repeal or destroy the State enforcement law.
> Thousands of our subscribers have been obliged to default on their subscriptions because they are out of work and have not cash even to buy the necessities of life. The financial situation has also hit some of our larger givers. One manufacturer who has given $10,000 a year is flat. Another one who has given $5,000 has even borrowed to his limit. A man who gave $10,000 last year has died, and it has been impossible to find anybody yet to take his place.

With William H. Anderson there now appears "big business" and millionaire manufacturers with contributions of $10,000 apiece. But Mr. Rockefeller is not mentioned. His contributions are secret.

New York is one of the very few States of the Union which has a corrupt practices act requiring returns by such organizations as the Anti-Saloon League, if they participate in elections, yet no returns of receipts and expenditures have ever been made by the Anti-Saloon League of New York, either at Albany under the New York corrupt practices act or in Washington under the Federal corrupt practices act.

Under date of April 11, 1922, in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, W. C. Shupp, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Missouri, is quoted as saying:

> The Anti-Saloon League is now building the strongest organization it has ever had in Missouri. We are extending our organization to every county and community and enlarging our membership.
> We should have for the work mapped out $60,000 or more. We expended $49,000 in the last prohibition campaign and then we ran short about $5,000.
> Our organization will fight Senator JAMES A. REED and other candidates who have furnished wet leadership or who are unfriendly to the enforcement of the prohibition laws.
> This will include Senators, Congressmen, prosecutors, and members of the legislature; in fact, wet candidates who have anything to do with legislation or the enforcement of the liquor laws.

Several months ago Parker Shields, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Tennessee, issued a leaflet asking for large contributions to the league, from which the following is a quotation:

> A number of Congressmen who hold the balance of power and pile up majorities in Congress come from the Southern and Western States, where money for organization and educational purposes is scarce. They have always had to have help from the national league.

Wayne B. Wheeler, his propaganda organization, and allied big-business interests did not begin corruption with Congress, but for years had corrupted the public mind by appeals to prejudice and passion, by false statistics, by partial and misleading statements and sophisms, and by a myriad of paid speakers, some of whom have been and some of whom are now in the Senate and House of Representatives, and by an elaborate organization in every State, comparable only to that of the Standard Oil Co. or some other great national industrial organization. All of this has been promoted by a vast expenditure of money, many of the sources of which have been kept concealed and the persons to whom much of it has been paid unrevealed.

Perhaps no way of preventing this corruption of the public mind by Wayne B. Wheeler, his propaganda organization, and allied big-business interests, or any other propaganda organizations or institutions can be devised without trespassing on those vital rights which should never be infringed—free speech and free press—yet some method of controlling these organizations by law should be devised, and my suggestion is that such organizations be compelled by law to incorporate and publish in Washington yearly all receipts and expenditures in detail.

It has been said, and is worthy of belief, that Wayne B. Wheeler and the interests he controls expended one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars in the series of years which preceded the adoption of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Some idea of the enormous expenditure of money previous to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution in 1918 can be obtained by the following facts, although they all relate to the period subsequent to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

Under date of November 15, 1918, the Ohio Dry Federation, one of the instruments of Wayne B. Wheeler, filed a return with the secretary of the State of Ohio, under oath, that it expended $104,366.85 in the election held in Ohio in November. Ohio, with New York, is one of the very few States which requires return of such expenditures to be made by such an organization as the Anti-Saloon League.

In 1920 Wayne B. Wheeler and allied big business interests divided the United States into districts, and from the southeastern district proposed to collect $5,000,000. March 4, 1920, Charles O. Jones, superintendent of the Georgia Anti-Saloon League, stated that he had "raised $240,000 during eight months in 1919," and that in the last five years previous, on a certain plan, Georgia alone had contributed $427,125.11. Yet Georgia is not a wealthy State, nor are there many millionaire manufacturers.

William H. Anderson, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, in his annual report in 1920, said that the New York league needed $1,000,000 a year, and that the receipts for 1919, or the fiscal year, were $343,000.

The American Issue of April 27, 1919, the official organ of Wayne B. Wheeler and his propaganda agencies, contained an official and carefully elaborated proposal to raise $50,000,000.

That the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was bought and paid for there can be no doubt. If fanatical and self-interested minorities by organization and a vast expenditure of money can amend the Constitution of the United States, there is an end to that Constitution and an end to our civilization.

If cunning and crafty men for their own purposes, no matter what those purposes may be, can master the mechanism of political action in the United States and spend vast sums of money and dictate laws to the Congress of the United States, that is the end of the Congress as a deliberative body and as a national institution worthy of respect.

If one minority can do these things to-day, another minority can do them to-morrow.

The Constitution of the United States as originally adopted was a spontaneous expression by men of their conception of the principles of government and of law, unmoved except by the highest public purposes and uninfluenced except by consideration of the public weal.

No money was spent to influence the passage of the Federal Constitution.

There has been no amendment to the Constitution of the United States until the eighteenth amendment which did not express a sentiment of the Nation which had spontaneously arisen and demanded constitutional settlement without the influence of money.

The expenditure of money had never been made in the United States for the passage of a constitutional amendment until the eighteenth amendment. There should be no possibility in the future, if laws can prevent it, of the Constitution being bought and sold.

The prevention of the repetition of this greatest of national crimes now lies in the hands of the present Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to say that I most heartily concur in every word that has just been said by my most able colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. A week ago I attempted to show to this House and to the country that the biggest bootlegger of all is the grand old man to whom we doff our hats and bow in humble obeisance—Uncle Sam. On Sunday last I picked up some of the New York papers and read therein that the Republican leader of this House, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], had said that the attempt I made to show a violation of the Volstead Act by the United States Shipping Board was a smoke screen solely intended to confound and confuse the efforts of the Republican Party to pass a ship subsidy act. The gentleman from Wyoming was hopelessly mistaken in his reference to me. I am one of the few Democrats who believe in a ship subsidy act. I do not say that I shall vote for the ship subsidy act which has been reported to this House, because some weeks ago, when this House passed a soldiers' bonus bill, I took a solemn oath that I would vote for no appropriation which mounted up into the millions until the soldiers' bonus bill was written into the law of the land, and it has not been written into the law of the land as yet. We did not have to pass a subsidy bill for the red-blooded boys of America. All we are asking the Congress to do—and, of course, I am not criticizing this branch, which has done noble work for the boys who answered the call to the colors—is to adjust their compensation, but I want that compensation bill passed before I vote for a ship subsidy act, as dear to my heart as a ship subsidy is, and I want to say that I have been lobbied on both sides of this House to vote against the ship subsidy bill, and that most of the lobbying has come from the Republican side.

I noticed in the morning papers that Prohibition Commissioner Haynes says that he proposes to take no action whatever to prevent the sale of liquor on the United States Shipping Board vessels. A week ago in this very body I called it to his attention. In other words, he becomes particeps criminis, and he joins hands with Wayne B. Wheeler in permitting a violation of the law on United States territory every hour of every day of every week. Let me call the attention of Mr. Haynes and Mr. Wheeler to section 26 of the Volstead Act, which if observed as it has been written into the law of the land as against the Shipping Board would produce very interesting results. I refer to that section of the law which has to do with the taking of ships for the sale of liquor and the carrying of liquor inside the territory of the United States. The Volstead Act provides—

First. It shall be the duty of the officer of the law to seize any and all intoxicating liquors found in such ship.

Mr. Chairman, the John Adams came into Boston last week, the latest, and as I am told the most princely, of Admiral Lasker's fleet, and when it got to the 3-mile limit it sealed the entrance to the bars, but within the 3-mile limit it was violating the Volstead law, because it was carrying liquor in United States territory and should have been seized by the prohibition enforcement officer in Massachusetts.

Second. The law provides that this officer shall take possession of such ship.

Third. He shall arrest the person in charge thereof.

Fourth. He shall proceed against the person arrested in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Fifth. Such ship shall be returned to the owner upon execution of a good and valid bond.

Sixth. The court, upon conviction of the person so arrested, shall order the liquor destroyed.

Seventh. Unless good cause is shown, he shall order the sale by public auction of the property seized.

And I am reading the law, men of America, the law that you passed by an overwhelming vote in your capacities as Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. No; I can not yield. Do not, please, interrupt me. [Laughter.] The section further provides—

If, however, no one shall be found claiming the ship, the taking of the same with a description thereof shall be advertised in some newspaper published in the city or county where taken.

And section 21, gentlemen of the House, of the Volstead Act provides—

That any room, house, building, boat, etc., where intoxicating liquor is sold is hereby declared to be a common nuisance.

And then it provides the penalty. And every United States Shipping Board trans-Atlantic liner, according to the law of the land, is a common nuisance, no matter how much money Congress votes to refurnish and rehabilitate Shipping Board ships. Men of the House, the point I am trying to make is that the whole thing is a tyrannical farce and enforcement seems to be peculiarly exercised. Now, mark you, in the winter when traveling is bad in the North, Florida and the Gulf resorts are full of prohibition agents. I notice by the papers nowadays, however, they have thoroughly cleaned them up and are preparing to spend the summer on steam launches and automobiles along the Canadian border, and when that is cleaned up it will be time to go to Florida again or perhaps southern California. [Laughter.] I want the House to know—and I mean this if I ever meant a word I have spoken in Congress in my eight years—I want the House to know that I stand for principle in this thing. I can no longer be accused of representing either the liquor dealers or beer makers. You put them out of business and you substituted bootleggers and moonshiners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Unfortunately the American people have been badly educated in the history of the foundations of their Government, and consequently they do not yet see where prohibition and all its ilk leads. I have at least in my speech of last week shown to the country that Admiral Lasker and Chief of the Bureau of Navigation Wayne B. Wheeler [laughter] and Rear Admiral Haynes have all run to cover. Perhaps after all personal liberty will again become a part of our Government. Frankly, I am pessimistic. Unfortunately and unhappily, religion and fanaticism have been made a part of prohibition propaganda, and they are mighty hard things to penetrate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, perhaps I may be pardoned if for a few moments I turn aside from the speech I have had in mind to give some attention to the various ebulitions from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] does not understand apparently why it is that Admiral Lasker and Chief of the Bureau of Navigation Wheeler, and Rear Admiral Haynes are giving their attention to enforcement of the prohibition laws upon the land rather than upon the sea. They are doing that, my friends, because for the first time since prohibition became a part of the Constitution of the United States, for the first time since that great event, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] has manifested a desire for a real enforcement of prohibition on any spot on the globe, and they are going to leave that job to him—on the sea.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Good; I will do it.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will take care of the seas, as he now manifests the disposition, the real friends of prohibition will try to take care of the land; and as they go from the resorts of Palm Beach to the resorts of the North, back and forth each season, I guarantee these prohibition agents are following assiduously the wealthy tourists of Massachusetts who go back and forth [applause], and who probably will need more watching in the way of prohibition than anybody else. I presume that when history comes to judge the Anti-Saloon League, of which the other gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has spoken to-day, the Anti-Saloon League will be finally judged just the way the saloon was judged, and that is by its fruits. The saloon was driven out from under the American flag because of its fruits, and if the Anti-Saloon League lives in history as being a worthy organization it will be because of the part it has played and is playing in properly representing the sentiment of the God-fearing, law-respecting people of this Nation in behalf of prohibition.

I enjoyed the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] a couple of weeks ago when I heard it for the first time. I have enjoyed it more, I think, to-day because something of its terrors have been removed by familiarity.

The two speeches I have heard to-day from the gentlemen from Massachusetts and the interview I read in the paper this morning from another distinguished man from Massachusetts, John W. Weeks, a member of the Cabinet for the moment, give us considerable Massachusetts nullification in one day. All these gentlemen of New England, the land of law and order, advocate sale of beer and wine in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. They are friends of beer and wine and advocate an amendment to the Volstead Act to permit their sale in defiance of the Constitution. While these gentlemen come into the House worrying about what is going to happen to the Constitution of the United States, while their evident effort is to secure the sale of 14 per cent wine, when the Constitution says that intoxicating liquors shall not be sold, still the country must not take too seriously, as the House does not, the gentlemen from Massachusetts, Mr. TINKHAM and Mr. GALLIVAN, or even the distinguished Secretary of War, who fears that minorities that agree with him are not going to be able to govern this country, and who stands on the burning deck of the old guard, proclaiming his belief that the majority can not be trusted. Speaking of habitual talkers against prohibition reminds me of an article which, of course, has no reference to any of these gentlemen from the land of the Puritans but nevertheless may be of present interest.

And may I suggest that this little article appeared recently as an editorial by Mr. Norman Hapgood in Hearst's International Magazine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPERBORES.

What is the acutest bore known to the human race? There is a game in which each player confesses his tastes He names his favorite novel, opera, pastime; what character in history or fiction he hates most; what experience is most distressing. To one person, listening all night to a window rattle may top the annoyance list; to another, sitting in wet underclothing in a draft. Is there anything more excruciating than the talk with which the haters of prohibition flood dinner tables? Night after night, month after month, they emit canned diatribes. No sooner is your napkin unrolled than the topic begins. Since January, 1919, there has not been a new word said. "People drink now because it is forbidden; they drink too much; bootlegging flourishes; workingmen, instead of being drunk every Monday, are loaded every day; drug addicts increase; homes are breweries; young people learn contempt for law." Expand these ideas and serve. Other topics are dead. Society has become a nightmare.

This editorial is no argument for prohibition. It is a wail against boredom. These * * * who now fill their empty heads with the evils of prohibition never made an effort to cure the evils of the saloon. High license was the nearest their minds could reach. The prohibition wave rose to its inevitable power because our legislators and our public were supine. While they slept money intended for shoes and education of children was taken from the wives of the poor and wasted in sodden drink. The saloon became the center of political corruption, of gambling, of prostitution. It was for the dress-suit or ruling class to check these scourges. They never stirred. After long suffering popular wrath took action, with roughness. Now it is for the same dress-suit class to hang its head, to hold its tongue, to give to the new institution a decent trial.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, while there are many seeking to make a success of that tremendous experiment—national prohibition—there are those who have never done anything to do away with the evils of the liquor traffic before the adoption of prohibition and who now are in the way of the eradication of those evils in the way decided on by the overwhelming majority of the people of America. One of the organizations that is most conspicuous—that probably has in its membership more of those dress-suit gentlemen than any other organization—is the National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. I heard nothing of that in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. He does not seem to be worried about the money they are spending to defeat the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and to defeat other dry candidates and who are active all over the country.

While professing to speak in behalf of purity of our elections and safety of our institutions from disorderly attack of friends of order, the gentleman shows clearly he is speaking rather in support of attack upon law and order, in defense of those who seek to nullify our National Constitution. If the former were the case, he would attack alike all organizations that seek with money and activity on a national scale to influence election of legislators. But he attacks the Anti-Saloon League, the only organization, with reference to the liquor issue, that has filed any reports of campaign expenditures at any time up to the present under the Federal act, and ignores the 30 organizations against prohibition that have never filed any such reports.

He referred to the support which the article in the Literary Digest of June 17 says is to be given to dry candidates in the effort "to keep dry Senators and Representatives in Washington, and to add to their number if possible," and to the aid promised by branches of the Antisaloon League for the reelection of Congressman VOLSTEAD this fall.

Why should not the drys want to see VOLSTEAD reelected this fall? His defeat would be hailed with delight by every enemy of national prohibition, by every advocate of traffic in intoxicating liquors. It is regarded by them as the end most devoutly to be sought, only less important than repeal of the eighteenth amendment itself, for defeat of VOLSTEAD would be hailed as repudiation of the Volstead Act, which is the eye and the right arm of the eighteenth amendment. In the eyes of the gentleman from Massachusetts VOLSTEAD's great offense is compliance with the Constitution.

But he omitted the following sentences immediately preceding his quotation from the Literary Digest article:

It is the announced intention of the wet forces, which are well organized in at least 10 States, to elect a "liberal" Congress and to defeat Congressman VOLSTEAD, who, they assert, is the author of all their woes.

To be accepted as a bona fide crusader for political purity he should require the same standard of those on each side of a political contest. And in this national liquor fight he ought not to so carefully overlook national programs now zealously carried on by wet organizations, even though they be his friends.

For instance, in the State of Michigan there is a branch of the said National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. It is said in the Detroit Free Press of June 16 that—

The Michigan branch of the National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment is now organized in 63 out of the 83 counties in Michigan and in every important city. This announcement was made Wednesday at a meeting of representative leaders held in Detroit, at which plans for this fall's campaign were discussed.

No decision was reached on the matter of submitting to the voters this fall of a constitutional amendment in the form of a resolution to permit the manufacture and sale of the lighter alcoholic beverages. No such amendment has so far been circulated by this association in Michigan, and it is unlikely to be a November election issue it is declared.

One decision reached at the Wednesday meeting was that every candidate for political office in Michigan this year will be called upon to go on record on the question of modifying the Volstead Act to permit the sale of beer and light wine legally. * * *

Every senatorial, congressional, and State and county candidate, as well as the legislative candidates of all parties will be asked to state his or her position on modifying the prohibition enforcement act.

The raising of a campaign fund to be expended this year for propaganda and in putting up to the voters the attitude of various candidates toward beer and wine also was decided upon. Newspaper advertising and personal letters to the voters will be used. Voluntary contributions on a monthly basis are being asked of the members to further this campaign and the committee expects to expend about $6,000 monthly.

It is probable that the committee will advance "wet" candidates in congressional districts where the chances of victory are regarded as favorable.

They propose the raising of an antiprohibition campaign fund—and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will note this—the raising of a campaign fund to be expended, please note "for propaganda." I think the gentleman talked on propaganda. Here we have it again, and "in putting up to the voters the attitude of various candidates toward beer and wine." They are going to have newspaper advertising and personal letters. It is probable the committee will advance wet candidates "in congressional districts where the chances of victory are regarded as favorable."

Things in Michigan are not going to be so terrible as all that might indicate, because they say they are going to use this money in districts where the chances of victory are regarded as favorable. What are the chances? When State-wide prohibition was adopted in Michigan, it carried in November, 1916, before our entry into the war, by a majority of 68,624. When it had been in effect about one year the wets proposed the return of light beer and wine and the sale of those so-called harmless intoxicating liquors was refused at the election April 7, 1919, by a majority of 207,520. Such was the reaction to beer and wine in Michigan. [Applause.] And two cities only in the industrial State of Michigan gave a majority—and when I speak of cities, I mean towns of over 5,000 population—only two gave any majority whatever for beer and wine. You would think that would give the wets reason to pause. Well, it does, because this organization has been announcing for months in Michigan that we would vote on a beer and wine amendment next November, a vote which this same statement says that they are going to postpone, because "the chances of victory are not regarded as favorable." In Michigan they know the blessings and the benefit of prohibition. The laboring men, the mechanics, the heads of industry, the farmers alike say, "We are done with the traffic in intoxicating liquor, and never want it to come back." [Applause.]

And least of all do we want any nullification of the Constitution of the United States. The Detroit Free Press, one of Michigan's most prominent and influential newspapers, has never advocated prohibition so far as I recall, but its lack of confidence in the efficacy of prohibition does not destroy its respect for the National Constitution. In an editorial June 3, 1922, the Free Press repudiated any beer and wine nullification program:

THE ONLY HONEST WAY.

In the midst of hurly burly, of noise and fury, and of random talk and intemperate recrimination over the proposed "beer and light wine" amendment to the Volstead Act, it is a relief and satisfaction to discover a sane discussion of the subject born of straight thinking. Such a discussion is provided by the Dallas (Tex.) Morning News, published in a community where the amendment seems to have become an issue in the congressional campaign. And the nub of what the Morning News says is this:

"There are some people who believe that it would be well to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and light wines. But if their belief is to command respectful consideration, it must be presented in the form of a proposal to amend or recast the eighteenth amendment. Only those who adopted it are competent so to amend or fashion the Volstead Act so as to permit the sale of beer and wines without violating the oath which its Members take. A proposal so to amend the Constitution would be entitled to respectful consideration even from those who would be sternly opposed to the proposal. But a proposal to amend the Volstead Act so as to permit the sale of beer and light wines is not entitled to respectful consideration, because it is a proposal to have Congress do something which the Constitution forbids it to do."

This is clear and right to the point. It is an absolutely correct interpretation of the situation, and it ought to have wide currency. It is the interpretation the Free Press endeavored to set forth in its columns some time ago when the American Federation of Labor heads made their pronouncement in favor of an alteration of the Volstead Act. Such an amendment by Congress would be a violation of public trust, a defiance of public mandate, and a legislative lie. For as long as beer and light wines are in fact intoxicating—and nobody can deny that thousands have become drunk by imbibing them—no statutory fiction can make them otherwise. To attempt to say that they are otherwise would be puerile stultification.

If mild intoxicants are to be reinstated in the United States, let the reinstatement be done decently, honestly, and in the way provided by the fundamental law. If the "wets" try to get what they want by proceeding in a proper manner, they will at least be entitled, as the Morning News says, "to respectful consideration," from which their present tactics bar them.

And such is the sentiment of the Nation. Beer and wine candidates in the recent Pennsylvania primaries failed everywhere. Friends of law and order, like DARROW, COUGHLIN, KELLY, KENDALL, SHREVE, and others, won out triumphantly over beer and wine candidates and against scandalous campaign expenditures. If beer and wine can not win in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, these gentlemen from Massachusetts must realize they are cherishing vain hopes.

I commend to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] his reading of the Literary Digest. I hope he did not overlook in the issue on June 10 the article, "A poll of 'best minds' on rum's return," where it said:

The latest poll concentrates on 1,500 leaders in various fields of activity and is taken by the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore. * * * Says the Manufacturers' Record in a booklet setting forth the results of the poll:

"These letters come from men of national standing, men known in every walk of life, in the great business interests and professions. They are in answer to a questionnaire which we recently sent to about 1,500 manufacturers, bankers, college presidents, and others as to whether, in their opinion, prohibition had proven a success, and what has been the result in their own experience and among the men in their employ."

A compilation by the Record gives the following results in percentage to the total:

	Per cent.
For prohibition in some form	98.50
Against prohibition	1.50
For strict prohibition	85.50
For beer and wine	7.00
Against Volstead law or present regulations	1.25
In favor of modification of Volstead law	.75
In favor of high license or Government control	1.00
In favor of dispensary system	.25
Undecided or noncommital	2.75

Thus we see in this verdict from a hundred cities that an overwhelming majority are for prohibition in some form. For instance, "I am unalterably opposed to a resumption of the liquor traffic, even the reentry of light wine and beer," writes Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, and Warren S. Stone, head of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, says that the longer he lives and the more he sees of the liquor traffic the more bitterly he is opposed "to the entire question of the manufacture and sale of liquor." "Best of all," notes the director of the college of commerce, University of Southern California, "under prohibition a generation of boys and girls are growing up who will soon come to maturity without the taint of alcohol."

In Detroit "the favorable effects of prohibition are apparent to even a blind man," declares the president of the Leland Motor Co., "despite the fact that we are but across the river from Canada." In Louisville, reports the mayor, "savings accounts show an increase of 50 per cent." * * *

So much for Massachusetts and nullification.

Now, I was diverted for a few minutes by this onslaught from Massachusetts. I want to take up the speech I had in mind, to speak for a few minutes on a matter of economy, which I am sure will have the interest of every Member here. We all know that the one thing the people of this country are asking above all else is a reduction of taxes, and the only way to reduce taxation as a Federal proposition is to cut down expenditures, and that has been the effort of the Committee on Appropriations under the direction of its splendid chairman, Mr. MADDEN, who has never been excelled in zeal or ability in that position.

In the Interior Department appropriation bill there were not many chances to make reductions, but your committee went at it as the servant of the House, trying to make the greatest reduction that could be made without sacrifice of efficiency. One of the things that was done in that bill was to abolish 19 land offices and consolidate the officers in 21 others. What was the need of that? Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the land service, that administers all the great domain of the United States, that sells our land, turns into the Treasury millions of dollars, but it costs twice as much to administer such land service as the Federal Government receives. In the year 1921 the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office shows that the receipts to the Treasury were $1,794,905 and the expenditures were $3,149,024 for this service. The money obtained for sales or leases of the public domain does not all go into the Federal Treasury, but largely into the reclamation fund, and is therefrom expended for the benefit of the States where these lands are located. I do not think there are any of us who complain much about that, except we feel that the administration of the service ought not to be a burden on the Federal Treasury, and in order to reduce those expenditures as much as possible your committee cut out some 19 land offices.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Interior Department appropriation bill provided for the closing of 19 land offices. Of these the office at Minot, N. Dak., was closed in May, 1922, by voluntary action of the Secretary of the Interior, and in obedience to law long existing. The office at Springfield, Mo., has already been closed, the provision as to the closing of that office becoming effective with the Department of the Interior appropriation act.

The other offices to be discontinued July 1, 1922, under the Interior Department appropriation bill are as follows: Camden, Ark.; Harrison, Ark.; Del Norte, Colo.; Hugo, Colo.; Sterling, Colo.; Alliance, Nebr.; Broken Bow, Nebr.; Clayton, N. Mex.; Fort Sumner, N. Mex.; Tucumcari, N. Mex.; Dickinson, N. Dak.; Williston, N. Dak.; Bellefourche, S. Dak.; Gregory, S. Dak.; Lemmon, S. Dak.; Timber Lake, S. Dak.; and Waterville, Wash. We consolidated the officers of 21 others, making in all an annual reduction of $128,000 in the cost of this service. Not much as compared with four billions of total Federal expenditure, but it is something, and we felt wherever there was waste it ought to be stopped. Now, there is a proposition before the House to restore those land offices. It is contained in S. 3425, which I have been opposing.

Of these offices, S. 3425, as passed by the Senate, provided for the reestablishment of Springfield, Mo., and Minot, N. Dak., now closed, and the following offices which the Interior Department appropriation bill will close Juy 1 next: Camden, Ark.; Harrison, Ark.; Del Norte, Colo.; Alliance, Nebr.; Broken Bow, Nebr.; Clayton, N. Mex.; Fort Sumner, N. Mex.; Dickinson, N. Dak.; Williston, N. Dak.; Bellefourche, S. Dak.; Lemmon, S. Dak.; Timber Lake, S. Dak.; and Waterville, Wash.

Said bill, as reported by the House, drops out some of these but adds Sterling, Colo. The pending bill, therefore, proposes either in the House or Senate the reestablishment of all the offices slated for closing excepting Hugo, Colo.; Tucumcari, N. Mex.; and Gregory, S. Dak. Whether these three will be added on the floor of the House completing the nullification of all the economy accomplished in the Department of the Interior appropriation act remains to be seen.

Gentlemen from the West who are trying to get greatly increased national aid for reclamation, trying to get the Smith-McNary bill through, it does not seem to me can afford to show to this House that they view some little petty patronage in their district as of more importance than they do the financial interests of the whole country.

Now, it is quite common for committees of the House to attack the Appropriations Committee as assuming some legislative jurisdiction, and very often they have said that the Appropriations Committee is doing this. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that there was passed in the year 1840, 82 years ago, an act which is now section 2248 of the Revised Statutes, providing that whenever the acreage in any land district fell below 100,000 acres the land office in that district should be discontinued.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Very briefly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did the act of 1840 contemplate the establishment of great forest reserves and withdrawal of land from possible entry?

Mr. CRAMTON. That will be for the gentleman to argue. The section 2248 is as follows:

SEC. 2248. Whenever the quantity of public land remaining unsold in any land district is reduced to a number of acres less than one hundred thousand it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to discontinue the land office of such district; and if any land in any such district remains unsold at the time of the discontinuance of a land office the same shall be subject to sale at some one of the existing land offices most convenient to the district in which the land office has been discontinued, of which the Secretary of the Interior shall give notice.

There has never been any effort on the part of the Public Lands Committee to amend the act in any respect. On the contrary, it is in full force and effect, not only as to 16 of the offices that we abolished, offices that were being maintained in absolute violation of law, but in addition 9 others we did not abolish.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, says that the area of land unappropriated and unreserved in the several districts named below was, on July 1, 1921, as follows: Eureka, Calif., 84,991; Lamar, Colo., 5,651; Lewiston, Idaho, 78,751; Cass Lake, Minn., 97,660; Duluth, Minn., 55,155; Great Falls, Mont., 97,079; Kalispell, Mont., 29,801; Seattle, 10,238; Vancouver, 43,158.

None of these did we attempt to close, though personally I feel they should be closed in compliance with law. We were trying to be a little easy on these gentlemen from the West. We picked out only what we thought were the worst cases. But that statute was on the books, and the Committee on Appropriations, instead of legislating, all that we did was to attempt to put the law in force.

Now, what were some of the facts about these districts? Why, one of the offices that was abolished, but which the Senate still proposes to restore, was the office at Springfield, Mo., where there are to-day only 48 acres of public land—or there were a year ago. These figures are a year old; the lands that have been disposed of in the last year must be subtracted from the figures that I will give. A year ago there were 48 acres of public land in the whole State of Missouri.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry I can not, because other gentlemen would also ask me to yield, and I have not the time. I am sorry.

Mr. VAILE. I was going to ask if the office is left in the House bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is in the Senate bill, and when you gentlemen go to conference with a pork-barrel bill you will have to make an agreement on a pork-barrel basis, and if you get your offices taken care of you must let others take care of their offices. It is a pork-barrel bill, built upon pork-barrel principles. In the Senate one Senator got up and said he had this, and it went in, and another got up and said he had that, and it went in, and there was no opposition. In the Committee on Public Lands you cut out two or three, but that will all end in conference. You will settle it in conference on a pork-barrel basis.

As I said, in the State of Missouri there are 48 acres of public land. I do not know how much it is worth to take care of that 48 acres, but it was costing us more than $1,300 a year to take care of them. You will find gentlemen in the House and in the Senate who still think that that office ought to be continued.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret I can not. There is an office in the gentleman's State at Del Norte, Colo. There is a lot of public land in that land district, 492,000 acres in that district, but——

Mr. VAILE rose.

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret I can not yield to the gentleman. He can debate the matter when the bill comes up for consideration, though, frankly, it will not come up. Last year the receipts of that office were $5,129 and the expenses were $3,067. Nearly 60 per cent of the money taken into the office went to pay salaries of clerks and receivers. What good or what benefit does that hold out to the reclamation fund or to the Government of the United States? The Land Office says it is grazing land, and the experience of recent years indicates that nobody is going to homestead it in the near future.

Further, here is an office at Camden, Ark. It cost only 22 per cent of the receipts to maintain it, but there were only 32,000 acres of land in that district. At Harrison, Ark., it took 69.7 per cent of the receipts to maintain it. At Hugo, Colo., there are only 1,800 acres of land within the district, and until the Committee on Appropriations took hold of it they were going to continue that office indefinitely. When we attempt to close up these worthless offices——

Mr. VAILE. Nobody is asking to keep Hugo.

Mr. CRAMTON. But nobody proposed to abolish it until this committee took hold of it. In the Hugo district there are 1,805 acres. In the Sterling, Colo., district there are 6,191 acres; not enough to make a good township. There are others, including Alliance, Nebr., with 14,950 acres; and Broken Bow, Nebr., with 11,592 acres; and Fort Sumner, N. Mex., with 655,450 acres, costing 40 per cent of the receipts to administer the office, and some of them costing as much as 200 per cent almost of the revenue to maintain them. I am sorry that my time will not permit me to set out the figures respecting these offices in full, but I will insert them in my remarks.

Mr. CRAMTON. Except in the case of Missouri, we have left a land office still in each of those States. We have saved money and we are not seriously injuring the service.

Take note of Arizona, one of the great public-land States of the West. It has available for entry 16,000,000 acres of public land. They entered last year 1,469,000 acres of public land, and have done it all through one land office. Not only are they satisfied but they prefer it, because, having one land office doing a good big business, they get substantial, able men as registers and receivers, who make able, good decisions that are not overruled in Washington. They have capable clerks with real work to do. The whole service is economically handled and it cost the Government of the United States only 9 per cent of the receipts to take care of that office.

I hope my friends from the West will work with the Committee on Appropriations in our efforts to get economy in administration. I know that no Member of Congress likes to have a little piece of patronage taken away from his district, although I think we all agree that the more patronage we have the more trouble we have. Still I know it is embarrassing to have it taken away. I know that the towns where these offices are located feel that they lose prestige with the closing of the offices. But this abolition of land offices has been going on for a century. They used to have land offices in the State of Ohio. That is where the first ones were located. There were once land offices at Marietta and Steubenville, but the time came when they lost those offices.

The time has come when Hugo and Del Norte and 15 or 20 others likewise ought to lose their land offices in the interest of the Treasury of the United States, and this can now be done without any sacrifice to the service. Yet some gentlemen who are not familiar with these matters, who have not gone into them as carefully as the subcommittee that took up this matter, want to know if this action of the committee is a "dark, deep, damnable plot," as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] inquired in committee. Why, it was just an effort on the part of the subcommittee to perform its function as a creature of this House, to secure economy, to secure enforcement of the national law. Now, I want to say that I was the weakest member of that subcommittee. There was upon it the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH]. No one in the House is more zealous than he for the welfare of the West, and no one better informed. There was the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], and there is no one in the House who knows the needs of the West better than he does, and there is no abler man in the House. These men gave hearty support to this measure, and they have the support of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and myself, who are not so well informed as to local conditions, but who have a fair realization of the needs of the National Treasury. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10871), making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] yield to me a minute?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, we learned from the President's letter that there is soon to be a recess taken by Congress for the purpose of taking a referendum on the ship subsidy bill, and I think before that recess is taken the Members of the House ought to know something about it themselves so that they can tell their constituents. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is going to speak on the ship subsidy. In view of my association with him on that committee for six years I know he knows more about it than any other man in the House, and I think the House ought to have the benefit of his information. Therefore I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-one Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, he had ordered the roll to be called, when 229 Members responded to their names, and he presented a list of the absent Members for printing in the RECORD and Journal.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I begin by asking the earnest patience of the House, first asking pardon for wearying you at this late hour when I know you are worn and tired; and by saying that the subject I will try to discuss is one not only of the greatest but perhaps the greatest question that has come before this Congress at this session, involving interests and questions of more magnitude in dollars and cents and economic and governmental policies and principles of greater moment than any one issue now before the public. It seems to be the one question on which the President of the United States has set his heart and on which he has determined to drive Congress through to the doing of his will. On the soldier bonus and many questions of great importance to the general public he is like the Sphinx, voiceless, and announces that he does not believe in Executive dictation to Congress. But on this question, involving vast grants of money and favor to vast interests, he reverses himself and uses both persuasion and threats to control Congress.

I have been on the Merchant Marine Committee for 13 years, and during all that time I have studied with what little intellect I have the question of making our merchant marine a success. I have tried to study the means by which those nations that have made it a success have been able to do so. I think as a member of that committee I have made some suggestions of value, but my study has led me to oppose to the uttermost the two chief propositions of the bill pending; that is, to oppose discriminating duties and subsidies to our ship interests from the Treasury of our country.

My colleagues, the last real tilt on this subject in the Congress of the United States was in March or February, 1907. Then there was a mail subvention bill before Congress which proposed to grant additional subventions for mail transportation amounting to the stupendous sum of three and a quarter million dollars. That bill was fought by the faithful Representatives of the West and the South and of the farming people all over this land to its death. This bill proposes that not three and a quarter million dollars for carrying Government mails, but $50,000,000 in direct subsidy to all ships without any service in return and indirect favors involving burdens on the Public Treasury and the people amounting to more than the subsidy, according to the proponents of the bill, when we shall have a privately owned merchant marine carrying 50 per cent of our foreign commerce. Bear in mind this is the charge upon the people for carrying only 50 per cent of our foreign commerce, while the same interests are privileged under the bill to fix their own charges without competition for carrying our coastwise commerce. The 10 years for which contracts under it are authorized to be made with ship lines by the board will involve a total sum in direct subsidies alone of $500,000,000. This will not be limited to the first 10 years, but these 10-year contracts can be made 5 or 10 years from now—that is, any time before the repeal of this law, and will be valid for 10 years after they are made.

What influences are back of this bill? Not the Republican platform, for that platform warmly indorsed and approved the bill known as the Jones Act of 1920. It indorsed it in toto, and that act did not contain either a subsidy or any of the other favors granted in this bill. In fact, that bill was declared to be the policy of the Republican Party with reference to the reinstatement of the American merchant marine, and on that platform the Republican candidates were elected. I, a Democrat, approved earnestly that policy as it was set forth in section 7 of that bill. I still approve it.

Here it is:

SEC. 7. That the board is authorized and directed to investigate and determine as promptly as possible after the enactment of this act and from time to time thereafter what steamship lines should be established and put in operation from ports in the United States or any Territory, District, or possession thereof to such world and domestic markets as in its judgment are desirable for the promotion, development, expansion, and maintenance of the foreign and coastwise trade of the United States and an adequate postal service, and to determine the type, size, speed, and other requirements of the vessels to be employed upon such lines and the frequency and regularity of their sailings, with a view to furnishing adequate, regular, certain, and permanent service. The board is authorized to sell, and if a satisfactory sale can not be made, to charter such of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board as will meet these requirements to responsible persons who are citizens of the United States who agree to establish and maintain such lines upon such terms of payment and other conditions as the board may deem just and necessary to secure and maintain the service desired; and if any such steamship line is deemed desirable and necessary, and if no such citizen can be secured to supply such service by the purchase or charter of vessels on terms satisfactory to the board, the board shall operate vessels on such line until the business is developed so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such line can not be made self-sustaining. The Postmaster General is authorized, notwithstanding the act entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," approved March 3, 1891, to contract for the carrying of the mails over such lines at such price as may be agreed upon by the board and the Postmaster General: Provided, That preference in the sale or assignment of vessels for operation on such steamship lines shall be given to persons who are citizens of the United States who have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines if the board is satisfied of the ability of such persons to maintain the service desired and proposed to be maintained, or to persons who are citizens of the United States who may then be maintaining a service from the port of the United States to or in the general direction of the world market port to which the board has determined that such service should be established.

Neither the President nor the Shipping Board has any commission from the people to propose or indorse this bill. Its framers know the American people are opposed to ship subsidies, and therefore they studiously avoid the use of the word subsidy anywhere in the bill and call the contract authorized to be made for payment of subsidy a "contract for compensation" to deceive the people. The hearings show that the American Steamship Owners' Association is back of this bill. On page 1058 of the hearings before our committee is the testimony of Winthrop L. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association. He was cross-examined by the minority members of the committee. Mr. Davis of Tennessee asked him this question:

Now, it was upon the recommendation of you and your association that Mr. Lasker appointed the three experts, Love, Smull, and Frey, was it, Mr. Marvin?

Mr. MARVIN. We favored the appointment of those gentlemen.

Then Mr. Davis asked:

You were requested to select certain men whom you could recommend, and you did select them, and he replied that he believed they were fit for important posts and he recommended their appointment.

Further, Mr. Davis said:

You were on the committee, as has been shown, that could give the details and data for the study and preparation of this bill?

Mr. Marvin said, yes.

Mark you, of these three leading officials of the Shipping Board two received $35,000 and one $25,000 a year, and they were selected by whom? By the Ship Owners' Association, the beneficiaries under this legislation.

Remember, Mr. Marvin is the vice president and general manager of the Ship Owners' Association of the United Sattes, under salary from them, paid to bolster and advance legislation like this.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, you wrote an article that was published April 22, 1922, in a number of the American Marine Engineering, under the title of "The merchant marine bill of 1922, analyzed," "One of the experts who assisted the Shipping Board in framing the bill outlines its merits. By Winthrop L. Marvin."

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Did you make a general recommendation as to what should be embodied in the bill?

Mr. MARVIN. There was an agreement among the committee as to certain policies, or the general lines to be followed in the building up of the merchant marine. That is the purpose for which we were appointed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The same article referred to the deduction from taxes of freight money paid by shippers shipping in American bottoms, and you state "this is an ingenious new departure intended to serve the purpose of the preferential duties of the original Jones Act, but as a matter of fact it is far more valuable and effective, for it would apply to all merchandise, dutiable or free, inward or outward."

Evidently Mr. Marvin was proud of this provision of his devising.

The provision of the original Jones Act to which you refer was section 34.

Mr. MARVIN. Section 34; yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Which both Presidents felt it inadvisable to enforce.

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

It seems that both Mr. Wilson and Mr. Harding refused to enforce a plain, straight law imposing discriminating duties on foreign ships, but the President is now urging a far more effective discriminating duty law, in this bill, because it is "ingenious" in form, as Mr. Marvin says, and is given nominally to the American shipper instead of to the shipowner. Of course, it makes a 5 per cent tax discrimination against foreign ships carrying from or bringing goods into our ports, violates our treaties in spirit, and invites retaliation and increases the burden on our exports and imports. Marvin knew this, but the President seems not to know it. Our treaties provide for equal treatment of foreign ships in our ports in exchange for equal treatment of our ships in foreign ports.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. You further state these elastic features of the compensation portion of the bill, together with the limitation on profits in one paragraph of section 702, are unique in American shipping legislation. A State-aided ship may not realize a net operating profit of more than 10 per cent. This is a legislative experiment that may be unwise in its results. It will undoubtedly facilitate the passage of the bill by Congress.

Mr. DAVIS just read that from Mr. Marvin's remarkable article. It has reference to a proviso in the bill that a company receiving a subsidy that makes more than 10 per cent net upon its capital invested shall pay back to the Government one-half of the excess over the net 10 per cent, which by the way is so worded that a single ship may operate for 50 or 100 per cent profit, but nothing is returned unless the Government can show a net profit of over 10 per cent on the company's entire capital. Mr. Marvin's statement that a State-aided ship may not realize a profit exceeding 10 per cent is therefore not true.

Mr. Marvin states in this article that all oil tankers and like craft owned by great companies are required to hold open until 10 days before sailing substantially one-third of their cargo space for use as common carriers, in order to be entitled to the graft called compensation in the bill. We would like to know just what service to the public this so-called compensation to oil companies is for.

The Marvin article proceeds:

Here again is a provision manifestly inserted to smooth the passage of the bill and meet the objections certain to be raised by a certain class of lawmakers.

Even the framers of the bill seem to admit that certain provisions of it were put in to deceive or cajole Members of Congress and the people. The whole bill is unique and ingenious.

What I mean to say, my colleagues, is this: That the American Steamship Owners' Association, through their vice president and general manager, were called into conference to frame a bill, and they framed a bill to meet by unique and ingenious provisions the strange consciences of the representatives of the American people who might oppose the giving of vast sums of public money to private interests, especially such interests as haul their own products in their own ships and already have such monopolistic power that they levy all the tribute they desire on our whole people.

I shall, perhaps, have more to say with reference to those provisions later if I reach them; but lest I forget I wish to say right here that the framers of this bill never expected the Government to receive back any of the subsidy granted them, nor did they expect or intend in any way to limit the right of oil companies or the United Fruit Co. or other big companies carrying their own products in their own ships to receive full subsidies under the bill, subsidies to monopolies that will amount to many millions annually.

There has been more ingenious propaganda favoring this bill than ever originated in the support of any other bill. And yet it is by the merest accident that this bill is before this House. The President of the United States sought to secure the services of Mr. James A. Farrell as chairman of the Shipping Board. Mr. Farrell is a shipping expert, a man greatly interested in the shipping industry. He never thought of advocating a subsidy, but, on the contrary, he has stated that under proper legislation American ships can compete with the ships of the world. Had that first selection of the President been made, had Mr. Farrell become chairman of the Shipping Board, this bill would not be before this Congress to-day.

What are the qualifications of the present chairman of the Shipping Board? Absolutely none for the position that he holds. His qualification was that of a great advertiser, a great booster, a great boomer, a great propagandist, with no knowledge of shipping whatever. Let me give you an illustration of the publicity efforts to pass this bill. On June 12 Representative DAVIS of Tennessee, who has given this subject the keenest investigation, the most sincere study, made a speech against the bill in this House of an hour's length that contained more meat than any speech that has been delivered in a long time. It was well worthy of the consideration of the public. It ought to be read in every household in the Middle West and interior parts of this country—yea, even in every household all over the land.

What publicity did it get? The next day the four great dailies of Washington came out. One of them had a reference to the speech of Mr. DAVIS exactly three and a quarter inches long. The others ignored it. But the Star, the Post, and the Herald all had a fulmination from the White House that the President had decided he would keep this Congress here until they passed the ship subsidy bill. And the Times had a full double-width column in which it demanded the passage of this bill, asserting that the agricultural interests, the chambers of commerce, and the labor interests were all before the committee favoring the bill, and that no American interest was opposed to it. All that goes out to the country. Even the Associated Press practically, if not entirely, ignored Mr. DAVIS's speech, but carried the propaganda.

Mr. VOIGT. May I briefly interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman will pardon me, I can not get through in my hour.

Mr. VOIGT. Just at that point.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. For half a minute.

Mr. VOIGT. Did any farmers' organization indorse this bill before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I had that in mind and I was going to answer it and I will answer it now. One J. W. Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau, a salaried position, in the city of Chicago, was seen and given data by Mr. Lasker. Just how much he was persuaded by him I do not know, but he was induced to send a telegram saying that the American Farm Bureau favored the bill and he came voluntarily, and when he came he was cross-examined. He admitted that his organization had always opposed any subsidy on principle, and that they had never in any convention or otherwise indorsed this or any other ship subsidy bill, but claimed that he and certain other gentlemen whom he had selected had constituted themselves a committee and had studied and approved the bill. This committee included Clifford Thorne, a lawyer, certain manufacturers, and traffic managers, and they got together and agreed they would support the bill, and so the telegram was sent. They seem to have done all their investigation in Chicago, and here with Lasker, and that is all of their farmer indorsement.

On cross-examination it appeared that he did not represent any organization of farmers in sending the telegram; that in his own brain, after being thoroughly dressed by the argument of Mr. Lasker and talking with his Chicago committee, he was for the bill, although he admitted that his order in convention had declared themselves on general principles opposed to subsidy legislation. So it seems to me——

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, right in that connection I think it well to state that Mr. Howard or Graysilver, one of the Howard committee, was invited to the White House to luncheon and appealed to by the President and Mr. Lasker on behalf of this bill. At the time he sent the telegram indorsing the bill he, Mr. Howard, was an active candidate for a place on the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Well, I did not know that, but his cross-examination absolutely wiped from under his feet any pretense that he represented any farm organization in his support of the bill, or that he really understood many features of the bill. On the other hand there appeared before the committee the representative established here in Washington of the National Grange.

That is the order having, I believe, some 800,000 actual, bona fide, paid-up members, the largest farm organization in the United States. They represent every State in the North and East, and Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Missouri, Oklahoma, Wyoming, and California. He said to us he did not want to do it until he saw their business and legislative representatives who came to Washington about this very bill. They came to Washington and they said to him, "Why do not you take a step, take a stand, as the grange has always done on this question of subsidy?" And then he came before our committee and he showed us that his order had actively opposed subsidy legislation ever since 1890 and was opposing it now.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman tell who that was?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It was T. C. Atkeson, of the National Grange, a brother of Representative ATKESON, now in Congress from Missouri.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman and one or two others came before us representing farm organizations and brought the resolutions of their orders both in the last convention and the conventions prior and spread those resolutions before us here in the hearings. But the public press do not tell the people that.

Well, I do not know whether the Times says the labor organizations—yes, it does; that the labor organizations favor this bill. Well, the Shipping Board had one witness who volunteered to come before us and indorse the bill. Who was he? He was the organizer of the Mates and Masters of Vessels, an association which had their organization in quarters provided by the shipowners, a man receiving a salary for the last 5 to 10 years of $5,000 a year, with office and clerical expenses, every dollar of which was paid by the shipowners, and that is the only kind of labor that came and indorsed the bill.

And yet the Times says it is indorsed by labor. On the other hand, who did not indorse it? The American Federation of Labor only a few days ago met, and a resolution, introduced by Andrew Furuseth, the president of the Seamen's Union of the United States, declaring against this ship subsidy bill, this very bill, was adopted by unanimous vote. I think I am justified also in saying that the chairman of the Shipping Board offered Andrew Furuseth, the president of the American Seamen's Union, to eliminate such features of the bill as were objectionable, and to include such amendments as he desired, if his order would get behind the bill. I do not know whether any of you know Andrew Furuseth or not. He is a real seaman; he may be sometimes extreme. During the war he came to the front nobly and urged his people to stand for the service of their country without any kind of slacking or disorder. And everywhere you put your finger on him you find him a patriot. His reply was: "No; his people could not support this bill; that it would put unjustifiable burdens on the masses of the people of America. Well, he was not alone. Other labor people came. I can not call their names. Two or three others came in opposition to the bill, but they came on their own expense and without having been previously talked to. I think the greatest schemer that ever had anything to do with legislation in this country is Mr. Lasker. There has not been an interest that he has not approached and preached to from one angle or another. He has sought to counsel and advise and cajole labor; he has sought to counsel and advise everyone else with whom he has come in contact. That may be all right. I am not criticizing him for that, but I want to show you the influences that are back of this bill. And he is working under the direction and supervision of the American Shipowners' Association and if the bill is passed and he remains chairman of the Shipping Board he will have more power for weal or woe over the fortunes of shipowners and ports than any man living ever had or ought to have.

There is another right curious thing. The law creating the Shipping Board requires that the board study and investigate shipping problems and conditions and policies of our country and of other countries, with a view of finding the policies best adapted to build up the American merchant marine, and make report from time to time on these matters to the President and to Congress. Under that law a committee was appointed by the board to make research into the history of shipping discriminations and various forms of Government aid to shipping. This report was submitted early in this year to the members of the Merchant Marine Committee, accompanied by a letter from Chairman Lasker. It is indorsed, "Compiled by the United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.—Washington, Government Printing Office, 1922." That is the only date I can give to it. I really think Mr. Lasker had not read it when he transmitted it, because it is an historical refutation of the claims of subsidy advocates that Great Britain and other great countries have built their merchant shipping by either subsidy or other aids. It is a pamphlet of 44 pages. It gives the history touching these matters of Great Britain, France, Spain, Japan, Belgium, the Netherlands, Sweden, Denmark, Austria-Hungary, and the United States. Those of us opposed to this bill caused it to be inserted in the hearings, where it appears on page 67.

It is well worth the earnest consideration of Members of Congress. It discusses at length the discriminating duty policy of the United States in its early history and shows the antagonism and, to some extent, the evils generally growing out of it, and that the United States from 1815 to 1828 persistently sought to eliminate it both by treaty and legislation, and that in 1828 Congress passed a bill offering reciprocity in the direct and indirect trades to all countries, under which some 32 treaties still in effect were negotiated; the final and last-made treaty thereunder being with Great Britain in 1830, which it shows was practically the end of discriminating duties. I have not time to discuss the report further, but it is even more full on the subject of subsidies. It winds up with the conclusion that a study of the authorities on subsidies, taking into account the policies adopted by the various countries, would seem to indicate that, with the exception of Japan, the policy has not been important in the building up of a merchant marine. It is proper to state, however, that the whole amount paid by Japan is insignificant when compared with what is carried in this bill, and that in the body of the report they say "success of Japan as against the failure of France under somewhat the same system may therefore be attributed to the greater efficiency of the Japanese, or, what is somewhat more correct, to the difference in the industrial development of Japan." And it further shows that in granting such subsidies as it did Japan required its beneficiaries to submit to the Government's fixing of rates and charges, while this bill does no such thing.

Japan is the only country whose success is in any way or slightest degree attributed in this report to subsidies, and I apprehend it will be found that the payments of Japan have been, in the main, mail and admiralty subventions. Surely Japan has never needed a subsidy on account of high wages or high cost of operations growing out of high wages. This report was like a bucket of cold water on the feverish advocates of subsidy. Mr. Lasker, however, was equal to the occasion. He practically suppressed or withdrew this report and had him another one made to order under his direction. I have not read this latter report, but feel sure it meets Mr. Lasker's demands as the arguments for subsidy. Reading the first report, I think one would conclude that the authors of it wanted to help the subsidy cause but would not sacrifice historical truth and facts. The second report seems completely the work of special pleaders, from extracts I have read.

The only countries that have earnestly tried to breathe life into the dead corpse of their merchant marine by any general subsidies are France and Italy, and they have completely and utterly failed. Subsidy in those countries has been like pouring water in a rat hole. It only promoted graft and inefficiency.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think it ought to appear definitely that the first investigation was made definitely by Judge Lasker himself.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It was presented by him. I think it was made by a committee appointed by him acting with the board. He transmitted it to the committee with a letter in which he asked the subsidy bill be passed. But that report, if understood, will enable any man to tear this whole bill, with its vast subsidies, to pieces, so he had to have a second and a different report.

Mr. DENISON. Has the gentleman any explanation to give the House and country why we have not a merchant marine now?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will certainly give that explanation before I am through.

Mr. DENISON. I hope the gentleman will. We have the capital here, and we have not the merchant marine of England or that which Germany had.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It is not in order now, and I will take it up further on.

Gentlemen, it is a strange course that the proponents of this bill have taken. The Republican Party came into power on March 4. Congress met in April, 1921. There was no hint of such a bill given until after the great advertiser, Mr. Lasker, had been some six months in office criticizing our former Shipping Board and working and consulting with the Shipowners' Association and Winthrop L. Marvin, their vice president and general manager and legislative expert.

Then, upon an innocent and unsuspecting administration and Congress it came with a rush. The source of its inspiration is clear.

It came early this year. On April 4, one year and one month after President Harding took his oath of office, the hearings began by joint sessions of the House and Senate committees on the subject. It could not wait to take the ordinary course of hearings before the Committee on the Merchant Marine of the House and then take its chances of passage through the House and then going before the Senate Committee on Commerce and then being reported by that committee to the Senate with the opportunity to the committee in the Senate to supplement anything that the House committee had failed to develop.

Your great tariff legislation takes weeks and months in the House and then goes over to the Senate, and the Senate takes the privilege of revising it and holding hearings on it. But how was it on this bill? This legislation must be put through by a joint committee, with bills introduced in the Senate and in the House by different Members at the same time, and then joint hearings. I want the House and the country to know how those hearings began and how they ended. When all things were ready, the witnesses primed, the skilled attorneys who prepared the bill and the representatives of the interested parties and the agents of thosse parties, when they were ready, the two committees were called together in joint session. Then, as a skilled lawyer would present his case, these selected witnesses, first this one and then that one, were rushed on the stage. The members opposing the bill, having no opportunity to prepare themselves on the subject as the testimony was introduced, cross-examined the witnesses as best they could.

We spent weeks and the proponents of the bill held us there day after day from the morning hour to the hour of adjourning at night, with scarcely time to attend to our other business, with no opportunity given us to investigate or find sources of opposition. Week after week the Shipping Board continued to send its witnesses in troops, in marshaled order, led by Captain Lasker, and in the latter part of May they concluded their testimony, and then we asked to have some witnesses that we might want to hear from summoned, and we were answered by the statement of the chairman of the joint committee that they were not going to summon any witnesses but only volunteers would be heard. And only volunteers were heard, and under that condition, with the greatest financial interests involved on the one side, interests that never sleep, interests that are always prepared, interests that keep in their employment the best talent that money can command, having presented their side, we were told then that no witnesses would be summoned who might speak for the other side, the taxpayers' side. None were summoned and in that way the hearings closed and every effort made to rush the passage of the bill in the crowded closing hours of Congress.

That, gentlemen, is the story of the way that this bill comes here. What is the matter? Is Mr. Lasker afraid that Congress and the people may get to understand his bill and its iniquities? But that is not all. I want to call your attention to what representations were made to the President on which he became so absorbed and convinced. I think the all-pervading Lasker has seen and talked to everybody. The President was nearly a year unmindful of the subject, apparently satisfied that his platform had indorsed the shipping act of 1920 and that that was the right policy, the policy which, if pursued, would build up the American merchant marine. The President has been misled into believing that if this bill is passed a brief period of time will bring forth a great privately owned prosperous merchant marine successfully competing with the world and carrying at least 50 per cent of our commerce economically, safely, expeditiously to and from all quarters of the globe and bring our Shipping Board expenses to an end.

The reason I believe that is this last letter of the President, written to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in which he makes certain statements. I do not believe that the President knows whether those statements are correct or not, but he believes they are correct; he thinks that he has gotten them from a reliable source. And, gentlemen, if you will pardon me, let me say right here that I do not want to say anything that would be at all discourteous or at all unpleasant to the President. When I was a boy I used to live near a creek. We had an old darkey, old Uncle Ned, who used to go down fishing on the creek. On one occasion he pulled up one of those big "turkles," as they call them. The mud turtle had taken the hook, and the old darkey stuck his finger in his mouth to get it out. The "turkle" came down on his finger, and held it fast; and the old darkey hollered to his son, "Come here, Aleck! Come here! Get a knife and whack this turkle's head off." Aleck says: "My God, daddy, I would like to whack the turkle's head off, and I would; but I'm afraid I'd whack your finger, too. [Laughter.] Now, I would like to whack the turkle's head off. I would like to get Lasker and the American Steamship Association, but I do not want to touch the President. I am afraid they have got his finger in their mouth. [Laughter.] Let me read you what the President's last expression is. He says:

> There was an expression of the popular mind in 1920. The party now charged with the responsibility spoke in no uncertain terms about the promotion and maintenance of an American merchant marine.

The President does not state here that they indorsed the shipping act of 1920, but that is what they did, and that does not hint at a subsidy. Let me tell you, gentlemen, you have all of you enjoyed listening to the President's messages.

You have an idea of his style. The President is a very busy man. He has to have help sometimes. This letter is not in the style of Warren G. Harding, but it is in the style of Andrew D. Lasker. Let me say further that not only the style but the substance of it is Mr. Lasker's. The letter says:

> The plain truth is that the Government shipping has cost the Treasury more than $50,000,000 during the fiscal year now closing. This does not include depreciation or deterioration running into the millions more, and we have a practical problem which can not be ignored.

That is the point on which a great deal of stress is laid. And the letter continues:

> Losses aggregating $16,000,000 a month—
> That is by the former administration—
> have been reduced substantially to one-fourth.

Gentlemen, it now goes all over this country that the former Shipping Board was extravagant and wasteful if not vicious and corrupt, and that its administration was costing this Government $16,000,000 a month, and that the present Shipping Board since they came in had reduced it down until it was costing $50,000,000 a year, and that for the purpose of getting rid of that $50,000,000 a year expense they had better give these ships to private enterprise and get rid of them. So they are using the present ship property of the United States and their own unjustifiable losses as a club with which to coerce Congress into the adoption of a measure that will give our ships away and for all time will saddle upon the American people from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year. But what was the evidence before our committee? I want to show you what the facts were. The President did not get that statement of $16,000,000 a month out of the hearings before our committee. There were 2,500 pages of that testimony. The President has not read that. But I will tell you what you can find. You can find that the net profits from the operation of the Shipping Board vessels, from the time when the Shipping Board was first organized down to June 30, 1919, were $166,493,994.85, and the net revenues from the beginning of operations to March 31, 1920, although they lost something between 1919 and 1920, was still $132,783,781.29.

Apparently there was a loss of some $34,000,000 in those nine months, as reported by the Shipping Board and incorporated in the report on the merchant marine bill of 1920, filed by Chairman JONES, of the Senate Committee on Commerce. When the American public reads the letter of the President, published in every newspaper in Washington and probably in every great daily in the country, it will be led to believe that under the former administration and the former Shipping Board this ship property had cost the Government of the United States $16,000,000 per month, or $192,000,000 a year. Yet the United States Shipping Board in 1920 showed, as that showing was given by Chairman JONES in June, 1920, when the shipping act of 1920 was reported, that the Shipping Board had made a profit up to June 30, 1919, of $166,000,000; and that on March 31, 1920, its net profits even then were $132,000,000. It ought not to be forgotten that the Shipping Board carried nearly all our supplies and nearly a million troops to France and brought back nearly 2,000,000 of our boys from France. Then the slump came after March, 1920. Every private shipowner began to lose money. So did the Shipping Board begin to lose money, and perhaps they have continued to lose money. Right here I am going to say that one great line in this country has been the Panama Steamship Co., operated by the United States under a salaried man. It has been in operation for 20 years and more, and every year but two it has made a profit. It lost in 1920 and also in 1921, and probably will lose something this year. Mr. Lasker has been reaching out for control of that line, but, thank the Lord, has not gotten it so far. But that is a digression.

Then, further, according to the report of Chairman Lasker, the excess of cash outgo over income of the division of operations under the old board for May, 1921, was $6,500,000, but for June only $1,714,000. Those were undoubtedly heavy losses, mainly under M. O. 4 contracts with big companies. They were perhaps the greatest losses they ever carried. The present Shipping Board took charge July 1, 1921, and report that net operating losses, including voyage losses, administrative expenses, repairs and betterments, insurance, and lay-up expenses of vessels not in operation for the first three months of 1922 averaged $3,413,021 per month, the voyage losses being only $792,178 per month, and that under M. O. 4 contracts, where the board's agents have no incentive to economize. It must be borne in mind that the board is carrying a great number of idle ships, as most private companies are doing also.

In a speech on the floor June 13, Congressman DAVIS of Tennessee, in a manner I can not improve upon, said:

> The chairman and other representatives of the Shipping Board in testifying at the hearings on the appropriation bill for the coming year, when they asked for the $50,000,000 appropriation for expenses and losses, estimated that same would be made up as follows:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Net voyage losses | $5,497,561 |
> | Other expenses: | |
> | Repairs and betterment, insurance, expenses during permanent lay up, advertising | 29,502,439 |
> | Administrative expenses | 15,000,000 |
> | Total | 50,000,000 |
> Martin Green, staff correspondent of the New York Evening World, summed up the situation as follows:
> "It costs 43 cents to spend a dollar in administration of the affairs of the Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, according to figures submitted to Congress in connection with the request for an appropriation of $50,000,000 for vessel losses and administration expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.
> "They are going to lose $5,497,561 in vessel operations, lay out $29,502,439 in accumulating the loss, and sink $15,000,000 in supervising the operation.
> "Comparison with the operations of another department of the Government should be in order here. The department selected is that which takes care of the internal revenue of the country.
> "The total internal-revenue receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, amounted to $5,408,075,468. The net expense of collecting this money was $27,043,000. It costs the Government 50 cents to collect each $100 of the money resulting from internal revenue and 43 cents to spend $1 disbursed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation in handling the people's ships."
> Mr. Lasker was questioned as to why it was that there was not a reduction in the Shipping Board expenses in view of the fact that there had been such a large reduction in the number of ships in operation, in connection with which attention is called to the following testimony at the hearings:
> "Mr. DAVIS. Well, you are only operating less than one-third of the vessels now.
> "Mr. LASKER. Well, as a business man you know this: That whether we are operating 400 ships or 1,200 ships, there isn't much difference in your overhead."
> I emphatically insist that the overhead expense connected with the operation of 400 ships should be decidedly less than the overhead expense connected with the operation of 1,200 ships, especially when the larger number were operated by a much larger number of operating companies.
> Chairman Lasker further testified as follows:
> "Mr. DAVIS. Even under the operation of this law, and at least until the ships that are sold on time are paid for, will it not be necessary to continue a very substantial Shipping Board force?
> "Mr. LASKER. Do I understand you to ask 'until the ships are paid for will it be necessary'?
> "Mr. DAVIS. Yes.
> "Mr. LASKER. The answer to that is no; but if your question means as long as we have to operate ships, where we have to keep substantially the same organization as now, the answer is yes.
> "It will be a good many years before we do not have any stuff left, with most favorable legislation. I want to make it plain here that I do not think the proposed legislation is going to, by the wave of a magic wand, give us a merchant marine."

Now you see that the loss under the old board was $16,000,000 a month, according to the letter of the President, and according to Lasker, when he is talking in glittering generalities for the public, the losses now are $50,000,000 a year; but the evidence does not sustain either statement. The old Shipping Board made no such losses even in the dull slump season of May and June, 1921, when it was in a measure wrecked by reason of the fact that the new act of 1920 had caused the appointment of a new and larger Shipping Board and the appointment of new commissioners was held up in the Senate, and under the conditions of the act the old board hardly knew what to do or where they stood. Nevertheless, for the two months May and June immediately preceding the taking over by the new board they lost about $4,000,000 a month, or $8,000,000 in two months, instead of $16,000,000 in one month. Doubtless they then had many ships running with little or no cargoes, which would never occur in normal times.

Mr. MADDEN. How could they tell what they lost when they had 8,000 voyages and only 3,000 had been audited?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman is going into criticisms of Lasker that I believe have been in controversy from the beginning. The so-called hearings that we had on the bill were full of inuendo as to the capacity and extravagance, if not worse, of the old Shipping Board, and not a single member of the old Shipping Board was allowed to come before that committee. Almost the very first utterance of Mr. Lasker when he took charge was to belittle the value of our ships and belittle the administration that had gone out. Mr. Lasker and the majority of the committee did not think it proper to have them come before us I would take their word as quickly as that of Mr. Lasker. Admiral Benson was not heard, although still on the board; Edward N. Hurley was not heard—he was a long time chairman of the Shipping Board; John Barton Payne, an able and conscientious representative of the people and a man with a fine reputation for ability, for a while chairman of the Shipping Board, was not heard; but everybody that could cast a stigma or fling a stone was heard. No voice was heard giving the magnificent work of the Shipping Board in sending soldiers and supplies to France and bringing them back.

Now, before I forget it, I want to say that among the very first criticisms of the present chairman of the board was that the old board had made with operating agents, who were big private shipowning companies supposed to "know how," what is known as M. O. 4 contracts, which are contracts under which the board farmed out its ships; it let them to agents under a contract that the agent should receive a percentage of the gross income of the ship. Mr. Lasker denounced that contract scathingly.

I will tell you specifically what that contract is. The Shipping Board lets the agent, usually a big private ship corporation, have a certain ship to operate upon some established line or some line desired to be established by the Shipping Board, with a contract that the agent shall receive 5 per cent of all outgoing freight and 2½ per cent of the incoming freight and 10 per cent of the outgoing and 5 per cent of the incoming passenger money. The board pays all the expenses of wages, subsistence, repairs, and overhead generally. Mr. Lasker before our committee and the Committee on Appropriations denounced that contract as vicious, almost criminal. We asked him if he was going to change it. Oh, yes, he would change it. But a year has passed—he took possession about the 1st of July, 1921, and it will be a year in a few days. Has he quit giving these big companies the M. O. 4 contract? Not at all. He is still giving that same M. O. 4 contract, and just last night in an address to an association of shipowners he made the statement that in addition to the commissions under the M. O. 4 contract he was hereafter going to pay them a husbandry fee. Where a company operates as agent five or more Shipping Board vessels it is to receive $400 per month per ship for the first five and $300 per month per ship for all over five in addition to the gross receipts commission. So that he adds to this shameful contract, as he called it, an additional bounty or bonus out of the pockets of the people in order that the Shipping Board expenditures may run still higher and make it that much more necessary to give the ships away and pass this bill.

Thus the profits of favored agents in a losing business are greatly increased. This gracious bounty to a company operating just five ships is a little more than the salary of three Congressmen.

But will the passage of this bill get rid of the board's vast overhead expense? I do not think you can at this time give the ships away as long as big companies can get the use of them free, with such commissions and husbandry fees as the board is now paying. They certainly will not buy unless the subsidies are bigger than the commissions and fees. It will be a matter of calculation, for these big companies, as to whether they will get more graft by the subsidy or the M. O. 4 plus husbandry fees.

Let us see how we will stand after passing the bill. If we do not sell these ships or a great part of them, we will have still left expenses for repairs, betterments, insurance during permanent lay up, and advertisement at least to the extent of all the ships not sold; and how many ships are going to be sold in a year? Mr. Raymond, I think it was, a prominent shipping man, testified before the committee that after the passage of this bill they might sell 100,000 or 200,000 or 300,000 tons of shipping in 12 months, and he was asked if they might sell 500,000 tons in 12 months, and said "no." What then? Why, we have 10,000,000 tons of steel ships, most of them laid up, and some 400 ships now in operation, and you can not sell in 12 months a half million tons. I do not think you can sell half of those now in operation, and perhaps very few of those laid up, and what are you going to do with the rest? You have got to keep that Shipping Board in operation, and you have got to expend the same $29,000,000 for repairs, betterments, and insurance on ships laid up that Mr. Lasker testified we are now spending, and the same $15,000,000 for administrative expenses, so the Shipping Board after the passage of this bill will continue to spend $44,000,000, or thereabouts. Yet the President's letter and Mr. Lasker would lead the people to believe that by the passage of this bill you will at once get rid of the annual $50,000,000 under the present expert administration, or $192,000,000 under the former. We may be spending a great deal to care for idle tonnage we now have, as private owners would have to do if they owned it, but we are not losing any such sums as Lasker claims in operating ships, and we would not lose half as much as we are losing if the Government was actually operating them.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Lasker himself said before the committee that even if this bill passed he would consider himself very happy if they disposed of the 400 ships under operation in 30 months; that he was unable to tell how many months it would take to dispose of the ships still remaining and of the other Shipping Board property.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That would dispose of about 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 tons in 30 months, the cream perhaps, and leave us the rest—some seven million tons—to care for at the end of 30 months, and that is the optimistic claim of Lasker. I thank the gentleman for his information. I might say that I am amazed at the gentleman's accuracy of memory. I know in a general way, but I can not remember the details; but my colleagues, just as sure as you gaze upon me at this moment, the passage of this bill will not stop the $50,000,000 expended by the present Shipping Board, as stated by the President, nor will it stop one-half or one-quarter of it in 30 months in my judgment. You have the President's letter before you and before the country, stating in effect that the former Shipping Board lost $192,000,000 a year in trying to operate and take care of our ships, and that the present Shipping Board is losing $50,000,000 a year, and that by the passage of this bill you will get rid of that and lose no money. This shows that even the President can be misled and misinformed, and that that statement in the letter that he sent to Mr. MONDELL, and perhaps to all of the Members of the Congress, is Mr. Lasker's statement and not the President's, and it occurs to me that Mr. Lasker is but the echo of Winthrop L. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the United States Steamship Owners' Association.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Very briefly.

Mr. LAYTON. How many tons of the tonnage that we now possess would be required in transporting all of the agricultural and industrial products of this country? Would what we have be sufficient to constitute a merchant marine?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think I shall answer that question in the progress of my remarks; but I want to say that there is not any question about some bad judgment having been exercised in the kind of ships we built. We have some ships that were not of the best. We need some ships that we have not got, but if properly husbanded and taken care of, if properly equipped and such alterations made as a wise man owning this property would make for its use, I think we have far more ships than we need to carry 50 per cent of all our exports and imports, agricultural, mining, and manufacturing, and that seems to be the goal aimed at. I think we are making a mistake now in not selling a great many of these ships to foreign buyers if we can, giving the preference, of course, to Americans.

Mr. LAYTON. That is the answer I wanted to get. If that is the case, where would the difficulty be in disposing of all this tonnage, provided by law we make it profitable for our capital to go into the business?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Of course we can sell every ship we have, if we will pay the purchaser a handsome operating profit regardless of his legitimate earnings. But, Mr. Chairman, I grow weary of always providing by law for the interest and profits of big capital under the pretense of protecting the American workingman's wages. The trouble with protection generally is, as Mr. Roosevelt once said, that it does not find its way into the workingman's pay envelope, and private shipowners are even now paying in many instances less than the British pay to seamen. I have made some figures on this alleged handicap of American high wages. Let us suppose that the crew, outside of officers, are paid an average of $40 per month, and that subsistence cost is 65 cents per day per man. That wage is higher than average private shipowners now pay, and that subsistence is just what the Shipping Board is now allowing to its agent operators. On a ship of 7,500 tons there are less than 30 members of the crew, excluding officers. But counting them at 30 their wage and subsistence would cost $59.50 per day, $1,785 per month, $21,420 per year. A thousand such ships would give us a tonnage of 7,500,000 and the total wages and subsistence would come to $21,420,000 per year. We will not use that much tonnage to carry 50 per cent of our foreign trade, probably not exceeding 4,000,000 tons, but I am estimating everything liberally. This bill appropriates for subsidy in one item alone $30,000,000 to $35,000,000, in 10 per cent of our estimated tariff revenue. That item alone will leave in the shipowners' pockets after paying the wages and subsistence of crews from $8,500,000 to $13,500,000; that is, if they operated 7,500,000 tons of shipping. And yet with the Government ready to sell him our ships at less than world market price the wages and subsistence cost is to-day the only excuse or pretense for Government aid or subsidy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman let me have a few minutes more?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 14 minutes more to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not forget to explain why we have not a merchant marine like England and Germany.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will give me his attention, I think I can do it. Why have we not a merchant marine? Is it for lack of discriminating duty or subsidy or of other Government aids? No! It is because of the fact that for 50 years under the policy of the party or parties in power—and I think that they thought they were doing best—they first imposed heavy duties on the material that went into the building of ships. This they did to protect our infant iron and steel manufactures, and then to protect our shipbuilders they provided that no ship should fly the American flag that was not built in the United States, and then to protect our ship operators they passed or continued a law excluding every ship that did not fly the American flag from our coastwise trade. Prior to 1861 nearly all our commerce was carried in wooden ships. Our wooden-ship builders were not in combination; it was before the day of vast combines. Our wood-ship builders competed with each other and, notwithstanding wages were even then higher here than in England, we built here the best ships for the money in the world, and furnished the cheapest unit of transportation and had the greatest merchant marine in the world, except possibly England.

After 1861, England having begun the building of iron ships better than our wooden ships, our high tariff on iron and steel raised the price of material to the American shipbuilder. Our exclusion of foreign-built ships from our coastwise trade gave a monopoly of our coastwise trade to American ship owners and builders. With heavy duties and higher prices on shipbuilding material, our builders justly doubted their ability to compete with England. Our coastwise trade was about six-sevenths of all our ship service anyhow, and so our shipyards, content with monopoly in that trade, abandoned all effort to compete in building ships for overseas trade, and American-built ships, the only ones that could get American registry, began to soar in price and American capital ceased to buy them to engage in overseas trade.

James J. Hill, the great railroad magnate, said, and he said truly, that the American ship that cost a million dollars could be bought in Great Britain for $600,000, just exactly the same ship, equal in every way. From the time we got into that situation, from the time we ceased to build wooden ships—in which we could and did excel the world, because we had the cheapest material and best wood-ship builders—and after the War between the States, in which we had lost and sold over 800,000 tons of shipping, we found that the American ships began to sell for higher and still higher prices, until they reached the prices named by Mr. Hill. Americans bought enough of them to carry our coastwise commerce, because they could not go in the coastwise trade unless they bought American ships. They could not sail in that trade at all except under the American flag. Well, gentlemen, the American would not buy our high-priced ships to go into overseas trade. Our shipyards in monopolistic control of our coastwise trade, six-sevenths of all our water-borne commerce, priced ships higher than anywhere else in the world, and only built for the coastwise trade, and our ship operators were forced to buy from them for that trade. Of course, when we gave an exclusive monopoly of the coastwise trade by declaring that no ship shall sail in the coastwise trade unless it is built in America, that alone, regardless of cost of building, put a premim on American-built ships, and for half a century they sold at a premium of 25 per cent to 100 per cent. What would naturally ensue, Mr. DENISON? If a man wanted to charter or buy a ship for overseas trade and in New York finds two sister ships in appearance and capacity, one built in an American yard—Newport News—and the other built on the Clyde or somewhere else, and finds the American ship price is a million dollars while the British vessel is $600,000, which will he buy? Which would you buy? Suppose you are going into trade between New York and Liverpool, and by treaty you have the same right to carry goods to Liverpool under the British flag as you have under an American flag, and you have got the same right to bring goods to New York under the British flag as you have under the American flag. Now, you are a business man, a patriotic American, but what are you going to do? Are you going to pay $400,000 to fly the American flag? No.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. I can not get through.

Mr. DENISON. Just at that point.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Well, then, briefly.

Mr. DENISON. Why did not the Democratic Party change these laws during the eight years?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I thank the gentleman that he has asked the question; we did change it, but you are going back under this old law. It may possibly be that it will not make so much difference now, as the Government has ships to sell at world market prices or less, but for 50 years of Republican rule it made such a difference that it drove our ships from the sea. By section 413 of this very bill you go back to that old law by absolutely requiring all repairs, renewals, and reconditioning to be done in American yards, and by the tariff bill as you passed it in the House you put the tariff tax back on shipbuilding material to force or excuse high-priced American ships in the future. We put material on the free list and to a great extent removed the restrictions preventing our citizens from buying ships where they pleased. I have hammered on this proposition for 12 years, but Congress has been hard to move. I have said, give the American the right to buy the cheapest ship he can find and put our flag on it, and he will buy ships and fly the American flag and will compete with all comers on the seas. Oh, you say, he has got to pay higher wages. Why, if he paid twice as much as the British ship, which is not true, he could compete, because the cost of the unit of transportation determines who will carry the freight. Wages are the very smallest element of success or failure in the operation of a ship. Why, if they were controlling or specially important, and if cheap labor countries had always the cheapest seamen, Japan or China would drive all competitors off the sea; Great Britain could not compete with Germany, France, or Italy; the United States could not compete with Mexico or Cuba.

There are many things that enter into the matter of furnishing the cheapest and best unit of transportation and thus securing the custom. Shippers want cheapness, regularity as to schedule, safety, and sometimes speed. Many things enter into all these. The actual cost per unit of freight is not the same in any two ships, just as no two factories produce the same article at precisely the same cost; and no two farmers produce a bale of cotton or bushel of wheat at precisely the same cost.

A bigger ship ordinarily can carry a ton of freight cheaper and faster than a little ship.

The ship which burns oil ought to carry cheaper than a ship which burns coal. If you make it an oil burner, you reduce your crew one-third and save 20 per cent cargo space. If your American ship goes fully laden to Liverpool and makes a quick turn around and comes back fully laden to New York, it can pay any kind of wages and beat a ship that comes back half laden. In truth the wages is a very, very small element in the question of success. Our merchant marine must prosper, if it ever does prosper, by reason of being better managed and better officered and better administered. In close competition modern loading and unloading facilities and equipment generally is a great element of economy. Equipment, management, and cargo is the whole thing. With all these elements entering into the question, what red-blooded American will say he can not compete?

But always bear in mind that when it comes to making the initial purchase of a ship no man will buy the American ship and pay twice as much for it if he knows he can run the cheaper ship just as readily and have the same rights under one flag as the other so far as the trade he is to engage in is concerned. I want to say the time has come when we should find our real trouble of the past 50 years and then apply the right remedy. The trouble and the remedy have been patent all these years. The narrow self-interest of shipbuilders and owners of ships in the coastwise trade made them refuse to see it, and the public generally have not understood it. Members of Congress generally have not understood it. They have thought that some mysterious disease struck our shipping about 1861 and killed it. They have heard from sources interested in covering up the real trouble all sorts of causes assigned for the decay of our foreign-going ship service. A favorite cause assigned was our antiquated navigation laws, but these could not be pointed out. Then they raised the wage question. And that, I presume, was the reason for the repeal of the old law requiring seamen on American ships to be American citizens. That law was repealed in 1864, and after that shipowners could use foreign cheap labor. Ever since then the crews employed on American ships have been mainly foreigners—black, white, and yellow. No; high wages did not kill our merchant marine, but, lest there still be some who may think that wages are the important question, let me read you from the San Francisco Bulletin of March 13, 1922:

WAGE QUESTION.

Let us take the alleged higher wages which the American shipowner is compelled to pay. American steamships in the trade to the Orient employ Chinese crews almost exclusively, only the licensed officers being American citizens. These Chinese employed on American ships receive a lower compensation than the Japanese employed on competing Japanese steamships in the same trade. It is obvious, therefore, that the Japanese shipowner is the one who has a real grievance in this respect. He pays higher wages to his sailors and firemen than his American competitor. Yet the American shipowners' present cry for subsidy is principally based upon the alleged fanciful wages paid to American seamen.

Those who framed the present subsidy bill have evidently forgotten the historical truth that when American ships were manned by Americans we managed to beat our competitors in any trade we tackled. It was not a question of cheapness in those days, because Americans on land and sea always received somewhat higher wages.

Cheap wages did not and could not bring back our flag in overseas trade. Neither cheap labor nor dear labor, skilled labor, nor unskilled labor will put a high-priced ship on the seas as against a low-priced ship, because the smaller initial investment makes the operator buy the cheapest ship. These facts have been covered up from the uninformed public. They have been unknown or ignored by Congress. Yet they constitute the key to the whole problem. We are the greatest Nation, with the greatest overseas commerce, and our merchant marine vanished because we refused to let our shipowners buy ships where they could buy cheapest, and incidentally we are the only Nation on earth that does it. I tell you now that if ours was a pauper labor country, our merchants would not pay a higher price for ships than their competitors, and operate them in free competition, if by putting up a foreign flag they could buy and operate the cheaper ship in the same trade. I repeat it: Give to the American ship operator the right to buy ships wherever he can get them cheapest and operate them in both our coastwise and overseas trade, and he will buy them and put our flag on them and compete with the world, and we will not bear the burden of $100,000,000 a year to make up a differential in wages which is nonexistent or of minor import. Gentlemen, study it. We have had various and sundry efforts made to solve the problem, but Congress has refused to look the real trouble in the face; we have never tried honestly, because we have let special interests with short sight stand in the way. The shipyards of the United States have said they will perish if you give us free ships. The Steel Trust said the same thing up to 1914—that if you took the duty off shipbuilding material our shipbuilders would go to England for material to build the ships. We knew that they were selling armor plate and ship material cheaper abroad than here, as they were selling steel rails and machinery cheaper. We knew they could compete. And so we put ship material on the free list, and after we had done it our shipbuilders did not go abroad to get the material but continued to build with our steel, with our material.

Our mills could not only compete here with the steel mills of old England and Germany but, with shipbuilding material on the free list, they drove them out of the American market and carried our steel products into every market of the world. Our mills did not do this until they had to, but when by law they were compelled to compete they did so gloriously. And so, as to shipbuilding material, we got back to be men, to the days when American manhood, resource, and skill put itself into competition with the manhood and skill of the world. If we put them to the test we will find that ships can be built as cheaply and perhaps better in America than in German or British shipyards. Our builders are bound to compete anyhow to-day or quit. We have 10,000,000 tons of shipping on hand. There will be little save repair work for our shipyards unless they build for foreign account. If they can do it while they are waiting for us to exhaust the supply of ships we have on hand to-day, they can do it afterwards. And, gentlemen, the time has come when American industrial life must stand sometime, somewhere, on its own feet. Are we to sacrifice the commerce of this country, the industry, the labor, the toil of the farm and the factory and the mine, to give an easy time and many millions to a few shipbuilders that in 1914 only employed 47,000 workers? We had better take those poor shipbuilders and pay every dollar of labor they have to have to build the ships and then tell them to go ahead: "You have got the iron, you have the coal, and the cheapest wood material; go ahead and build in competition with the world, and build better ships and sell to our merchants as cheaply as they can buy anywhere else." Give us a chance on the sea to let the American flag float over the world. That is the way! [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Has the gentleman a list showing what American companies have earned?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have. I will read you a brief and accurate statement as to some of our companies.

American ships, if honestly financed and efficiently operated, can compete with foreign ships, as many of them have done in the past and as many of them are doing to-day, without subsidies. Various shipowners testified at the hearings, and not one of them even claimed that his line was losing money now, although it is universally admitted that this is the worst time in the history of shipping. Not only have at least most of the American privately owned lines made profits during peace times but practically all of them made fabulous profits during the war. For instance, the Luckenbach Steamship Co. made a net profit on its capital stock of 666.9 per cent for 1917 and 236.2 per cent for 1916. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. paid a dividend of 200 per cent in 1916 and 405 per cent in 1917. The Dollar Steamship Line made a net profit on its capital stock of 322.9 per cent during 1916, the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. made a net profit on its capital stock of 82 per cent for 1917, and during the years 1915 to 1920 made a net income of 365.3 per cent. The Atlantic, Gulf, and West Indies Lines earned a net profit of more than their entire capital stock during the years 1915 to 1920.

Mr. LAYTON. You do not think that is pertinent as to the times of peace, do you?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Let me read it, and then I will answer your question:

The United Fruit Co. made a net income of $94,147,500 during 1915 to 1920 upon a capital stock of $50,000,000, which was increased to $100,000,000 upon the issuance of stock dividends of 100 per cent in 1920; during those years it added $66,176,490 to the surplus. The Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel Corporation operate a large number of ships in the transportation of their own products and would be entitled to the subsidies and other aids provided by the pending bill; it is unnecessary for me to call attention to the enormous profits which these "infant industries" have always made. All of the facts and figures here given, as well as much other data along the same lines, appear in the record of the hearings.

Let me add that a period of shipping competition, running, I think, to about 1910, caused very low rates at that time, and perhaps some losses, to operators, but about that time the big lines all entered into agreements to keep down competition, among themselves, and fight competition from outsiders. These were called ship conference agreements. Our investigations, lasting over a year, showed that every real line in the overseas trade, American or foreign, was in the conference. Rates began at once to rise, and no losses were sustained by any of the conference lines after that. In 1914, before the German war, ocean rates were nearly twice what they were a few years before. These conference agreements divided and apportioned territory and fixed schedules of rates and sailing, and so forth.

Now, then, Doctor LAYTON, all this is very pertinent. It not only shows what will happen under this bill, but the Shipping Board gives as a reason for these great subsidies to private shipowners the alleged fact that they have more invested in their ships than British owners have. That even if they buy the board's ships at $20 per ton they must add the cost price of ships they bought before or during the war or just after the war at $100 or $200 per ton, and then find the average cost of their ships, and on that average cost be assured good returns. Thus if a company has 100,000 tons of old shipping for which they paid $150 per ton, and buys of the board 100,000 tons, at $20 per ton, their invested capital ought to be considered $17,000,000. When asked if British prices were not also high during the war the board admits it, but says that the British shipowner has written off his book values by profits made, and therefore his ships have less book value, and he has less capital cost in his business than our shipowner. I ask you, If the American owner made these profits during the war, why not make him write off his profits and reduce his book values, too?

The real fact is that American lines have not written down their book values because by not doing so they were allowed to earn a greater sum, as legitimate earning on investment before excess profits taxes began to be assessed—and now they or the Shipping Board are trying to use these stilted values as a reason for giving them big subsidies. The contention is ridiculous, silly; but it is what the board contends.

I am not without company even among ship people in knowing that a ship operator under the American flag can compete with the world without a subsidy.

On pages 1741–1742 of the hearings appears a letter dated March 22, 1920, from the International Mercantile Co., P. A. S. Franklin, president, making three distinct offers in behalf of his company to the then Shipping Board. He states that they are desirous of developing business under the American flag, particularly between the United States and Germany, and that they are prepared to buy a sufficient number of ex-German combined passenger and freight steamers to adequately cover the service between North Atlantic ports and Hamburg as soon as the board is in a position to sell them on the basis of 25 per cent cash, they to recondition the steamers at their expense. Pending that time he offers to operate them for the board on a commission basis or to charter them for a term of five years, and offers to prepare form of contract if the board is ready to do business on any one of the lines named. He declares they have no fear of being able to hold their own and protect the business against competition in both east and west bound passenger and freight business. He states they have their own offices in Hamburg and Antwerp, with native Americans in charge; that they also have passenger and freight offices and agencies in the principal interior places of Europe. Then he adds:

In the United States we have our own salaried passenger and freight offices at each Atlantic port, and also in many of the important interior cities, and in addition we have our own offices in Seattle and San Francisco on the Pacific coast.

We claim that nobody else in the world can put before you such an organization for securing steamship freight and passenger business on both sides of the Atlantic.

8. Regarding the establishment of services from Hamburg to foreign countries other than the United States, we are confident that if the present chaotic commercial and political conditions will permit of sufficient business being done to warrant the profitable operation in such services of American-flag steamers our American organization in Hamburg can efficiently handle the business; and as previously advised you, as such business is obtainable, we are prepared to negotiate with you with the view of sharing the losses and profits of such business; but we claim that it is impossible to say to what countries or ports steamers can be profitably operated at present.

While on this feature of the case we want to point out to you that we are to-day operating for you Shipping Board steamers from Hamburg to Antwerp to the east coast of South America, and if this proves successful there is no reason why the same policy should not be pursued regarding other trades as business conditions become normal.

Again on April 2, 1920, he wrote the following letter (see page 1743):

HAMBURG SERVICES,
9 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, April 2, 1920.

Admiral WILLIAM S. BENSON,
Chairman United States Shipping Board,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ADMIRAL BENSON: Responding to your letter of the 26th ultimo we inclose herewith a form of agreement covering the management and operation of a group of eight ex-German vessels and providing for their ultimate purchase if and when the board is authorized to sell. We have reduced our views regarding the arrangement to the form of a contract, as we believe that it will facilitate your consideration of the various terms and conditions necessarily incident to such an arrangement. Kindly understand that if in the judgment of the board any detailed alterations are desirable, we would very gladly discuss them with you.

We would also like an opportunity of taking up this subject and the inclosed proposed contract with you and would appreciate a time being fixed most convenient for the board.

Yours very truly,

P. A. S. FRANKLIN.

I give these brief extracts. There is much more in the record, but these show that the biggest shipping company in the United States was ready to buy or charter and operate ships under the American flag without a subsidy where the fiercest competition would be met. The trouble was that at that time political conditions were chaotic, Congress was debating what its shipping policy should be and the functions of the Shipping Board were almost suspended for lack of a definite declaration of policy by Congress. The shipping policy was finally determined by the Jones Act of June, 1920, but that act provided for the appointment of a new shipping board, and so I presume the old board did not wish to forestall action of the new board. The Senate refused to confirm the appointees to this board made by Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Harding delayed appointments of the new board until about July 1, 1921.

Shipping the world over became more and more depressed. The new shipping board chairman began a campaign of criticism of the old board and depreciation of our ships and denial of our ability to compete with the world in either building or operating ships, and very likely began to make or listen to suggestions of a great subsidy bill. Every time he appeared in the press or before committees our old shipping board and our shipping capacity seemed to be further discredited and then the vast subsidy scheme of the present chairman was sprung on the country and I have no doubt private capital will not now invest in shipping until they are assured either that this bill will pass or it will not pass. If the bill passes shipping investments to some extent will be made in our ships at such prices as the present board may be willing to take and the board intimated that that price will be around $20 a ton and then we will have initiated an American shipping era of corruption, greed, and incapacity. If the bill is killed definitely we may look for some delay before the American ship operators will take courage and begin to do what P. A. S. Franklin wanted to do in 1920, and what Mr. Rossbottom, who is actually operating ships on a reasonable salary directly for the board, says he can do with good ships, that is to say, enter the list of ship operators in fair, free, and equal competition with the ships of other nations. And with ships that cost less than those of their competitors, with skillful management, with the best equipment and ample facilities and proper support by the American merchants and public, our ships will prosper as they have not prospered since 1861. Meantime the Government may have to hold the bag and supply the necessary shipping and routes for our commerce until the return of normal conditions.

On page 375 of the hearings you will find in the testimony of Mr. Thomas H. Rossbottom:

Mr. HARDY. Let me ask you: How are those vessels operated now, Mr. Rossbottom? I do not mean whether by oil or coal, but are they operated directly by you for the Shipping Board, or under some form of charter hire?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. No; they are operated directly by the Shipping Board.

Mr. HARDY. You pay no commissions to anybody as an operating fee?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. No.

Mr. HARDY. These vessels of which you have charge, some 12 in number, you say, or 13——

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. They are operated directly by you for the Shipping Board?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. They are.

Mr. HARDY. And your pay is not on a commission basis but you have a salary?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. I have.

Mr. HARDY. And as I understand you, all of these ships that are really fitted for the trade have been earning money?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Yes.

He then testified very fully, showing that every vessel he had which was fit to be operated was making good money, and he gave us the exact earnings for four months ending December 31, 1921, and said that if the Shipping Board would give him a fleet of good ships he would not take off his hat to anybody, and the board has such ships which they could give him. If the American people could all read the testimony of Rossbottom in full they would have no doubt that even the Government can operate American ships at a profit. What they need is to get more Rossbottoms and fire all their M. O. 4 agents. Rossbottom is operating the only ships the board does operate directly.

The policy the Government ought to pursue is simple and plain. They ought to let the shipping world know that they have ships to sell at world market prices, and to those who will operate them on desired routes at a shade under world market prices. If they can not sell them, let them charter them. If they can not charter, then let them stop the M. O. 4 contracts and operate them directly by the Government to the extent of maintaining or establishing necessary commercial lines, and let them sell the remainder of the ships to foreigners if they can and use some of the money received to equip the ships retained by the Government in the very best form. That is substantially the policy of the Jones Act. That policy will give us a merchant marine which will in a few years be owned and operated by private owners.

Mr. Chairman, what I believe and what I think I have shown is that with the cheap ships now at his command the American owner can operate ships under the American flag without any kind of Government aid. I think I have shown that he can operate any first or fair class ship he now owns under the American flag without aid. And I believe this bill is a monumental looting of the Treasury of the United States and a monstrous crime against the American people.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I to-day introduced a resolution which I will ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. CURRY. I am not going to object, Mr. Chairman, but I would like to have the gentleman from Texas state——

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rather thinks that that is improper. Leave has been granted, as I understand it, to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CURRY. The Chair asked if there was any objection, and I reserved the right to object.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be taken off the floor in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan has the floor. The request of the gentleman from Texas will be deferred until later. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Alien Property Custodian, appointed under the trading with the enemy act, is a trustee, charged by law and morals with the duty of conserving and administering honestly and economically all property seized under said act; and

Whereas it has been frequently and definitely charged by newspapers, magazines, and other publications of responsibility and wide circulation, by Members of both Houses of Congress, and by individuals in private life that maladministration under former custodians was frequent and palpable, that properties of enormous values have been sold by the custodian to favorite purchasers at prices far below their reasonable value, and in some instances to ineligible purchasers; and

Whereas it has also been charged that prodigious fees have been paid by the custodian to lawyers, some of whom were representing the custodian and representing alien enemies at the same time, and that lawyers who represented the Alien Property Custodian in the seizure and administration of trust properties have in many instances been permitted to represent claimants to and secure the return of the same properties from the custodian; and

Whereas it has further been charged that very large amounts of properties belonging in fact to American citizens were seized and many millions of dollars of property belonging to American citizens are still withheld from them, notwithstanding German citizens and subjects have in many instances been able to obtain release of their property without congressional authority; and

Whereas it has been charged also that in the exercise of an alleged discretion the Alien Property Custodian has refrained from seizing many thousands of properties belonging to enemy aliens resident in the countries with which we were engaged in war, at the same time seizing thousands of properties belonging to neutrals and American citizens, and holding and administering them at great expense and loss; and

Whereas the administration of said office has disregarded the principles of law and equity which should control the conduct of a trustee in dealing with such property, with the result that vast properties were dismembered and wasted and a favored few have been enriched at the expense of the trust property; and

Whereas the astute and crafty alien enemy who knew where to seek proper influence avoided the seizure of his properties while American citizens and neutrals in large numbers were deprived of control and dominion over their properties; and

Whereas it was the duty of the present custodian when he took office to inquire into alleged maladministration of the trust estate and to seek to have appropriate proceedings taken to restore to the trust estate all properties which had been fraudulently or illegally disposed of, and all illegal or excessive payments made out of the trust funds; and

Whereas it has also been charged that the present custodian, although in office upward of a year, has taken no steps or proceedings to investigate the alleged frauds in connection with the administration of his predecessors or to restore to the trust estate any properties illegally or fraudulently transferred or funds improperly disbursed, but, on the contrary, when the German peace resolution was before Congress in June, 1920, strenuously labored to persuade the Foreign Relations Committee of this House to write into the peace resolution a provision which would confirm, ratify, and make incontestable at law all seizures, sales, and other transactions of his predecessors theretofore occurring and all like transactions of himself thereafter to occur; and

Whereas it has also been charged that the present custodian has authorized and paid to certain lawyers excessive fees; that many lawyers who in the recent past have represented the Alien Property Custodian in the seizure and administration of properties are now representing claimants to the said properties before the Alien Property Custodian; and that the present custodian still permits and tolerates such a practice; and

Whereas such charges have been so frequent, so insistent, and so widespread as to create a condition which can not be ignored without grave injury to the good name of our country, and the situation demands a full and impartial inquiry: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of this House a select committee of nine Members for the Sixty-seventh Congress, which said committee is hereby authorized and directed to fully investigate all seizures, contracts, sales, expenditures, and other transactions of the Alien Property Custodian and the administration of said office, and all contracts, sales, expenditures, and other transactions of any company or corporation under his direction, or under the direction of officers, directors, or agents by him appointed, or in the appointment of which he participated, during and since the late war with Germany.

In addition to the powers herein conferred said committee is hereby authorized to employ counsel and other assistance; to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess which may occur during the sessions of the House, to meet at such places as said committee deems advisable; to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, such subcommittees when so appointed to have authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, and to meet at such times and places as said subcommittee shall determine, subject at all times to the direction of the whole committee; and

Resolved further, That said committee shall report to the House, in one or more reports, as it may deem advisable, the results of its investigation, with such recommendations as it may care to make; and

Resolved further, That the Speaker of the House is hereby authorized and directed to issue subpœnas to witnesses, upon the request of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, during any session of Congress or during any recess of Congress during a session; and

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to serve all subpœnas and processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcomittee thereof.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, House Resolutions 323 and 324, introduced on April 11, 1922, by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself, provided in substance for the appointment of a committee to investigate the contracts and expenditures made by the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Alien Property Custodian during and since the late war, and the settlement of any such matters, and to investigate the civil and criminal prosecutions or lack thereof by the Attorney General, the Alien Property Custodian, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy.

It will be observed that one of the important functions of the proposed committee would be the investigation of the administration of the office of the Alien Property Custodian. On four occasions in the recent past I have addressed this House in relation to the Attorney General and what I conceived to be his neglects and dereliction. This phase of the discussion pertinent to the resolution naturally and inevitably leads us through one of its angles or ramifications, into the office of the Alien Property Custodian. The Attorney General is the chief legal adviser of the Alien Property Custodian. Under a former administration the gentleman first appointed to the office of custodian later left that office to become Attorney General, and his chief of the bureau of investigation of the Alien Property Custodian's Office succeeded him as Alien Property Custodian and likewise was appointed the Assistant to the Attorney General. The relations between the two offices have not only been theoretically but in a very practical sense close and blending at many points. Under the present administration, of course, the Attorney General continues to be the chief legal adviser of the Alien Property Custodian, and one of his assistants has a continuing assignment as the legal adviser of the custodian. So far as the administration of the affairs of the custodian's office is concerned and whatever derelictions there be, must be known to and shared in by both departments.

According to the report submitted by Mr. Palmer, as custodian, for the period ending February 15, 1919, the value of the enemy property seized up to that time was $700,000,000. Before and since that report was made vast properties have been sold, some at private and some at public sales, many manufacturing plants and business enterprises were operated under the control of the Alien Property Custodian, and stocks, bonds, and almost every other form of property have been disposed of or otherwise dealt with.

It has been frequently and definitely charged by newspapers, magazines, and other publications, of responsibility and wide circulation; by Members of both Houses of Congress; and by individuals in private life, that properties of enormous value have been sold by the custodian to favored purchasers, in some instances to ineligible and illegal purchasers, at prices far below their reasonable value; that prodigious fees had been paid by the custodian to lawyers, many of whom were representing the custodian and representing alien enemies at the same time; that maladministration was frequent and was palpable; that the principles of law and of fair dealing which should control the conduct of the trustee in dealing with trust property had been disregarded in a manner so open and flagrant as to manifest a cynical disregard and contempt for public opinion, or the opinion and the responsibility of Congress, and for the possibility of civil and criminal liability arising out of this course of conduct. Members of this House as well as Members of the other House of Congress, who, in the past, in the discharge of their duty have called public attention to the conditions to which I am now referring, have been openly flaunted and abused by the persons responsible for these conditions. And one may almost feel justified in the conviction that these men must feel a sense of security, must feel sure of immunity as the result of conditions or commitments of which the public is ignorant. And up to this time, I regret to say, official nonaction by the present custodian and Attorney General and the silence and patience of Congress has given to them that security and that immunity of which they seem so fully assured.

The property seized and administered under the trading with the enemy act was taken and held in trust, subject to the final disposition of Congress, and because of that status it was and is held for the United States. Until that status is changed frauds in reference thereto are frauds against the United States.

The former custodians were trustees charged by law, and by principles of equity centuries old, with the duty of administering it honestly and economically. The present custodian is a trustee charged with like duty. It was his duty when he took office to inquire into alleged frauds against the trust property which depleted it in quantity or in value, and to seek to have appropriate proceedings taken to restore to the trust estate of which he was trustee all properties which had been fraudulently or illegally disposed of, and all depletion which were the result of a disregard by his predecessors of their duties as trustees. The Chemical Foundation Co. and the Bosch Magneto cases have been pointed out as typical instances of the most flagrant sort of maladministration of the trust property calling for swift and drastic action. What has been done during the past year and more by the present custodian and the Attorney General in regard to these matters? Absolutely nothing so far as results are concerned. May we depend upon the present Alien Property Custodian and his legal adviser, the Attorney General, to take such steps now as should have been taken several months ago? Is an investigation under this proposed resolution necessary to expose conditions that will compel official action to restore to the trust estate that of which it has been despoiled and correct improper conditions that still exist? The facts I am now about to lay before you will answer both these questions.

About the time, or shortly before the German peace resolution came before Congress for action in the spring of 1921, the present custodian was appointed to office. At and prior to that time the charges to which I have already referred had been made against the administration of the custodian's office. Several Members of this House and several Members of the Senate had placed these charges in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Suits were then pending to set aside sales by the Alien Property Custodian upon allegations of fraud and conspiracy, and the fact that these suits were pending had been commented on in the public press and had been mentioned on the floor of both Houses. The Chemical Foundation Co. was under attack in Congress and the press. The Bosch Magneto sale was being attacked in the courts. Other transactions were also conspicuous before the public. These, and many other transactions of the Alien Property Custodian, had been the subject of much discussion during the 1920 presidential campaign, and responsible party leaders had repeatedly and solemnly declared that if the Republicans were returned to power impartial investigations would be carried forward without delay and civil and criminal prosecutions instituted in cases calling for redress.

In this situation and in the face of these facts and shortly after his appointment the present custodian appeared before the Committee of this House on Foreign Relations, when it had the German peace resolution under consideration in 1921, and for what purpose? Was it for the purpose of seeing to it that nothing in the peace resolution would in any way impair his right and his duty to inquire into previous maladministration of the trust property? No, indeed. His purpose was directly to the contrary. He sought to persuade the Foreign Relations Committee of this House to write into the peace resolution a provision which would confirm, ratify, and make incontestable at law or in equity all seizure sales, and so forth, of his predecessors in office as well as sales thereafter to be made, and he proposed an amendment to this effect, which, of course, the committee very promptly and very properly rejected.

I invite your attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 30, 1921, pages 3403 et seq.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Was the sale of the Bosch Magneto Co. consummated under the former Alien Custodian or under the present Alien Custodian?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Under the former Alien Custodian.

Mr. LAYTON. I just wanted to establish that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The peace resolution was before the House at that time. The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. PORTER, speaking to the resolution, among other things, said:

> We purposely omitted confirmation of sales for fear it might confirm sales that are alleged to have been fraudulent * * *. All through the drafting of this legislation we kept that point to the front, and I feel certain that there is nothing in this resolution that will confirm, either directly or indirectly, any fraudulent sales, if there were any.

Another member of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, speaking to the resolution, said in part:

> Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, says this point was kept to the front during the drafting of the resolution. Yes, and if I may say it without violating the rules of propriety, I desire to add that I helped to keep it to the front, and that I helped to keep it to the front, Mr. Speaker, because of the work of A. Mitchell Palmer and of what I had learned of the attitude and purpose of his successor, the present Alien Property Custodian.
> And this reminds me that yesterday one of the papers published in this city contained the statement that the resolution as now presented to the House by the conferees had been drafted in consultation with and embodied the suggestions of the present Alien Property Custodian. Now, his desire and purpose are clearly shown in the brief which he submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a copy of which I have in my hand. From it I now read:
> "And all fines, forfeitures, penalties, seizures, and sales imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained."
> He wished that all sales made by A. Mitchell Palmer or any of his successors should be by law confirmed and maintained. He also said in his brief that he wished a certain amendment, in order "to avoid any ambiguity and so enable the custodian to complete any program of sale he had made."
> Now, listen, "without possibility of contest at law."
>
> Remembering that newspaper statement and remembering the purpose and plan of the Alien Property Custodian I propounded the very important question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], and I am glad, indeed, to have elicited the response that he gave.
> There was a hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress, June 4, 1919, on the nomination of A. Mitchell Palmer for Attorney General. He had sold these millions of property, the owners not knowing anything about the sales. There was, of course, an opportunity for fraud. * * *
>
> Mr. Palmer then became a candidate for Attorney General, to have charge of possible prosecutions. Here is what Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey, said at that hearing:
> "Several of my constituents, all Americans, and many others in various States, had complained to me continually of the injustice of the administration of the Alien Property Custodian's office and Mr. Palmer's interpretation of the law and its administration. There had come under my observation the sale of several properties which I believe had been sold at extreme sacrifice."
> It is now said, and I believe not denied, that one of the assistants of Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer is one of the principal officers of the company which purchased one of these very valuable properties at private sale and at a price greatly below its value.
> One statement is made that the property was worth from $12,000,000 to $14,000,000, and that it was sold at private sale for less than $3,000,000.
> And yet the present Alien Property Custodian in his brief asked not only that all sales made by either of his predecessors or by himself should be by law ratified, confirmed, and maintained, but he also asked that the law should be so drawn as to "avoid any ambiguity and to enable the custodian to complete any program of sale he had made without possibility of contest at law."
> Mark that language. No matter what the same might be, he wanted no possibility of contest at law.
> Interesting testimony was given on July 15, 1919, at a hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. Francis P. Garvan, a former assistant of A. Mitchell Palmer and his successor as Alien Property Custodian. He was examined by Mr. Moore, then a distinguished Member of the House from Pennsylvania and now mayor of Philadelphia. I will read some of the questions and answers:
> "Mr. MOORE. Now, he obtained that legislation [Mr. Palmer] subsequently through the medium of riders to appropriation bills, did he not?
> "Mr. GARVAN. The facts show. I know there was an amendment passed. What it was a rider to I am not familiar with, but I assume your statement is correct.
>
> "Mr. MOORE. I asked the question for this reason: The assumption of Congress, when this bill was passed, was certainly that the Alien Property Custodian would be trustee for property seized?
> "Mr. GARVAN. Yes.
> "Mr. MOORE. And I think that originally there was no intent of Congress when this trading with the enemy act was passed to provide the Alien Property Custodian with authority to sell property seized and then convert the proceeds without coming back to Congress."
>
> Certainly not, Mr. Speaker, without coming back to Congress, without reporting the figures at which sales were made, and letting Congress say whether the property of absentee owners should be sacrificed. * * *
> "This continues:
>
> "'Mr. GARVAN. I think the first intent was only to sell to prevent waste and to protect the property.'
> "And I stop right here in my reading from that record to ask any gentleman here to arise and tell the House if, during the six months' debate, beginning in the spring of 1917 and ending in September, 1917, there was ever a word on this floor or in the Senate said by Senator or Representative urging that the Alien Property Custodian be given the right to take that property and, in his discretion, at public or private sale dispose of it? The debates were very elaborate and exhaustive. Some of the distinguished participants in that debate are here now before me and they can rise and say what the understanding was.
> "Every one of them will admit—he will not have to admit, but will be glad to say—that the only understanding was that the Alien Property Custodian was to take that property as custodian and so keep it that it would not go to waste or be seriously injured, and that it should be sold only when a sale should be necessary to prevent waste, and that the proceeds must be retained and turned into the United States Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 20 minutes more.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Then Mr. Moore of Pennsylvania asked this question:

> "Under the original trading with the enemy act, he did not seem to have sufficient power. The present Alien Property Custodian has just stated that Mr. Palmer did not feel that he had sufficient power to sell.
> "Mr. KITCHIN. But he did get it afterwards?
> "Mr. MOORE. He did get that power by coming in at a time when all was excitement and secured what he wanted by the passage of riders to appropriation bills.

He got it, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, by getting a rider on the urgent deficiency bill, thus amending a law that had been under discussion for six months in the Senate and the House, the only understanding being that, of course, while he had in his hands hundreds of millions of dollars worth of alien-owned property, he should be a common-law trustee, responsible for an honest, open, and aboveboard dealing with the property of absentee owners.

* * * * * * *

Therefore it was, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that I asked the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs whether this elaborate amendment with its somewhat involved phraseology would in anywise confirm or ratify any sale made by any Alien Property Custodian, there being now in the courts suits to set aside some of these sales, the complaints charging, in effect, conspiracy to defraud and alleging the acceptance of such small amounts of money for extremely valuable property as in the language of the law to constitute a badge of fraud. Certainly while such suits are pending we ought not to enact a law confirming all sales of such property.

I am very glad that in reply to my question the chairman of the committee said that the distinct understanding of all of the conferees on the part of the Senate and of the House is that in nowise does this amendment affect or make valid or confirm or seek to maintain any sale by any Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. PORTER. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman if the present Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Miller, did not ask that such a provision as the gentleman from Wisconsin is discussing be put into this resolution; that is, a provision protecting sales that have been made by the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I mentioned that a moment ago.

Mr. Chairman, what I have just quoted from the record of the proceedings of this House clearly disclosed, to use the language of the Member from Wisconsin, Mr. COOPER—

> The attitude and purpose of * * * the present custodian.

This action, on the part of the present custodian, to persuade this House to ratify and confirm the sales and transactions of the former custodians, was of the gravest character and importance. If it had been successful it would have had the most serious consequences to the Republican Party and would have been a complete negation of the pledges which our leaders had made, as well as an offense against honest government. That it did not succeed, is to the everlasting credit of this House.

Does anyone suppose that the present custodian, then but recently inducted into office, took this action wholly upon his own responsibility, and without conference with and the approval of the Attorney General? Will it be denied that in the preparation of the amendment to the peace resolution proposed by him ratifying and confirming sales and transactions of the custodian, and in the preparation of the brief submitted by him in support of such proposed amendment, that he did not have the cooperation and assistance of the Attorney General's office.

Thus we find at the very outset of his official career, a determined, deliberate effort to have Congress put the stamp of its approval on frauds committed, to have Congress ratify, for instance, the Chemical Foundation transaction, the Bosch Magneto sale, and other similar cases, and make it impossible for prosecutions, either civil or criminal, to be brought. And will anyone now seriously contend that, without the lash and whip of congressional investigation, officials who sought to persuade Congress to confirm these transactions, and happily failed in their efforts, and who apparently have since sought by official nonaction to accomplish indirectly what they failed to accomplish directly, may now be trusted or expected to prosecute with diligence or with any desire to succeed if prosecutions are instituted?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the gentleman if he has taken up with the Attorney General recently the Bosch Magneto matter, which for months and months they have been investigating and which within a few weeks they will begin prosecuting?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have not been down to the Attorney General's office recently.

Mr. FOSTER. My question is, Have you been down within six months to discuss the Bosch Magneto case?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have not within three months been down. I have discussed this case recently with the Attorney General.

Mr. FOSTER. You asked the House: "Will anybody seriously contend that the officials desire to succeed in prosecutions," and so forth? I understand the position of the Attorney General's office with respect to the Bosch Magneto case referred to. Have you, within six months, had any conversation with him about it, before bringing in a resolution criticizing the department as you did last night before the American Legion?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am glad there is a gentleman who has the temerity to get up here and defend the Attorney General.

Mr. FOSTER. I will try to secure the gentleman more time. If he could secure 10 minutes from the other side, as he has done in this case, perhaps you can secure some more time to explain what was said before the American Legion last night.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I do not question that, but I am willing to consume a little bit in yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish the gentleman would use some of it in explaining the position he took last night before the Legion.

Mr. WOODRUFF. What I stated before the Legion last night, as quoted in the paper, was substantially in accordance with the facts, although it was not quoted with entire accuracy by the press.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he said that four slackers who were overseas with him are in that service in the Department of Justice. The gentleman is quoted as saying that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. If the gentleman will carefully read the newspaper accounts of what I said at the legion meeting last night he will know I said nothing of the kind. The gentlemen to whom I referred in the Attorney General's office were not overseas, and they were slackers.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is reported in the morning papers as saying that that office was in the hands of slackers.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The men to whom I referred at the meeting of the American Legion were men who had charge of the prosecution of war frauds in the Attorney General's office prior to my speech of April 11. Any references made to men who had joined the Attorney General's staff since that date were made in complimentary terms.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are quoted in the morning paper as saying that that prosecution was in the hands of slackers. I tell you I know of three colonels and one lieutenant who were over there, who have been assigned as special counsel to the War Profits Division.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I am very glad to hear that and I presume their appointments were of a very recent date.

Mr. FOSTER. I can take ten minutes and convince everybody except you.

Mr. WOODRUFF. You undoubtedly can secure the 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I have asked for it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Newspapers of wide circulation have recently carried stories concerning H. Upmann & Co. The matter presents some very interesting phases. An article in the Washington Times of Thursday, May 18, of this year, states that a year after the property of this concern was seized, Mr. Garvan reached the conclusion that the seizure was illegal, and the property was thereupon released and returned. A short time ago one of the leading newspapers of Habana (in which city the Upmann's have their headquarters) stated that Upmann & Co. had spent upward of a million dollars in the United States in securing a return of the seized property. These statements were apparently predicated upon examination now being made by accountants, into the affairs of this concern in connection with liquidation proceedings.

Evidently the Alien Property Custodian experienced a great change in heart and in opinion between the time the properties of Herman Upmann and Upmann & Co. were seized, and the time when they were subsequently released. Herman Upmann and his associates in Herman Upmann & Co. were German citizens. They did not reside within the United States. They were clearly within the terms of the trading with the enemy act. On page 151 of the report of the Alien Property Custodian for the period ending February 15, 1919, the following excerpts appear:

> The best ally which Germany had in Cuba was Herman Upmann, a German subject, and a close friend of Hugo Schmidt, who was one of the best financiers in Cuba. His capital is invested in every commercial branch of the Island Republic. Like an enormous octopus, he has reached out with his tentacles and has grasped every field of industry throughout the Republic. * * * Through the employees of his different firms he was able to organize a German propaganda machine and obtain valuable information from Germany.
> When other Cuban exporters ceased to export tobacco and other commodities to Germany, Upmann increased his activities. Through certain intermediaries in Holland he was able to smuggle several shipments into Germany, and received enormous prices for them.
> Many of his holdings are registered in the name of Upmann & Co., a partnership composed of Herman Upmann, Albert Upmann, and Frederick Tidemann. This partnership has been dissolved.
> Upmann's holdings in this country amount to approximately $3,000,000, which is represented by bank deposits, trade accounts, and stocks in various concerns. All this property has been taken over by the Alien Property Custodian.

No one who reads what I have quoted from the report of the former Alien Property Custodian but what will admit that he made out a case clearly justifying a seizure of the property, and also requiring that he hold it subject to disposition by Congress. However, it appears from the official records of the custodian's office that on December 28, 1920, about a month and a half after the American people had decided that the late administration should retire from public office in the early part of the succeeding March, the claim of Upmann for the return of this property was allowed, and the trust fund was depleted to the extent of $3,000,000, if the figures given by the former custodian in his report may be relied upon. Just what sort and variety of arguments were used to convince the former custodian that he had erred in seizing the property in the first instance we, of course, do not know to a certainty. Evidently it was an expensive proceeding for Upmann. To the unbiased mind it might reasonably appear that if the property of Upmann had been wrongfully seized in the first instance and had been wrongfully withheld from him for a year or more it should have been returned to him without expense and with an apology. Conversely, if it had been rightfully seized in the first instance and rightfully withheld it should not have been returned to him until Congress had authorized such action. However, Upmann was not without friends and without influence in the places and positions where they could do him the most good.

In the proceedings for the return of this property he was fortunate enough to secure the services of an attorney, who is, or at least at that time, so I am informed, was the counsel for a New York financial concern which had received valuable favors in the way of deposits from the Alien Property Custodian, and who had as one of its officers Mr. George J. Gorbett, a gentleman who was one of Mr. Garvan's chief aids in putting over the Chemical Foundation deal, who became the secretary of that concern on its organization, and who, therefore, had received very substantial compensation, out of trust properties, of course, for services rendered to the custodian, in one instance a fee upward of $25,000 in addition to sundry other emoluments on other occasions. Further comment is unnecessary. The Upmann matters, among many others, should be investigated.

While we consider the ease, expensive ease, perhaps, but nevertheless apparent ease, with which Hermann Upmann, described by the former custodian as German octopus, smuggler, propagandist, and so forth, could deplete the trust fund by the return of property worth millions, I wish to call your attention to the fact that according to the statement of the present Alien Property Custodian made before the Appropriations Committee of this House on December 12, 1921, there was still held by the custodian at the close of business on November 30 last, upward of $29,000,000 worth of property seized from and belonging to American citizens, and this condition existed three years after the armistice had been signed. Apparently American citizens were not as successful in securing a restitution to them of their properties as were German spies and propagandists.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer a question there?

Mr. WOODRUFF. A brief one.

Mr. LAYTON. I will be brief. That property was seized before the present Alien Custodian took office, was it not?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes; and returned to its owners.

According to the same statement of the Alien Property Custodian there was still held upward of $30,000,000 not listed as belonging to Germans, Austrians, interned enemies, or American citizens. It was not listed in his statement as belonging to any class of alien enemies. It would be interesting to know to whom it belongs, and why it is held.

I will refer to another very interesting phase developed by the statement of the present custodian, to which I have already referred. A former Alien Property Custodian, in his report for the period ending February 15, 1919, states on page 10 of that report that the value of the properties seized up to that time was $700,000,000. These figures do not take into account properties seized after the period covered by the report, or the earnings of going concerns, stocks, bonds, and so forth. The great bulk of the properties seized consisted of going concerns, which continued to be operated until sold by the Alien Property Custodian, interest-bearing bonds, and dividend-paying stocks, and the like.

Presumably, when properties were sold, the proceeds were invested in securities, as by law required. Many of the plants operated under the control of the Alien Property Custodian must have been operated at a large profit, because we find on page 14 of the same report, in defending the unrestricted program of selling continued after the armistice, the custodian says:

> More than that, we would have been forced to account at the end of the war for enormous profits made by many of these businesses.

I think I am conservative in saying that apart from the value of the property seized since the report was made, and this was considerable, the earnings upon the seized properties during the past four years should amount to upward of $100,000,000, which, added to the value of $700,000,000 fixed by the report, would make a total of upward of $800,000,000, which could now be accounted for, less the value of property returned upon claims legitimately allowed.

The statement made by the present Alien Property Custodian before the Committee on Appropriations on December 12 last showed the value of all properties in or which had passed through the trust, and including all claims allowed, to be approximately $575,000,000, or nearly a quarter of a billion less than we might reasonably expect to find there.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Not now, Doctor, as my time is very limited. How much of this shrinkage is due to depreciation through maladministration, how much is due to the sale of properties far below their reasonable value, how much is due to wasteful administration, how much is due to practical gifts to officials, friends, and favorites of the custodian's office, such as the Chemical Foundation case and others of like character, I am unable to say. Only an impartial investigation will disclose the truth, and obviously that can be gotten only through appropriate action by Congress or one of its branches.

It was no doubt the view of Congress when the trading with the enemy act was passed that all the properties of the enemies which fell within the provisions of the act should be dealt with on the same basis. Certain provisions of the act were, however, susceptible of a different construction. Thus we find on page 1 of the report of the Alien Property Custodian for the period ending February 15, 1919, the custodian points out that the right to demand and take over enemy property was and is primarily vested in the President, and need only be seized "if the President shall so require."

And to quote the language of the report:

> Thus giving to the Executive the fullest discretion as to what enemy property shall be taken and what shall be left in the hands of its private custodian.

And the report further continues:

> The power and discretion vested in the President by the section of the act thus referred to were delegated by Executive order to the Alien Property Custodian.

According to this the powers of the President under the provisions of the act referred to were lodged in the Alien Property Custodian, and he construed the act to authorize him to seize such enemy-owned property as he saw fit and abstain from seizing such enemy-owned property as he saw fit to favor. It is a fact that the Alien Property Custodian failed to seize considerable properties located in this country owned by persons and concerns resident in, subjects of, and engaged in the prosecution of the war in behalf of countries opposed to the United States, and of the existence of which property the custodian had full knowledge. It is also a fact that in thousands of instances properties which were upon investigation found to be enemy owned and which were demanded were not in fact reduced to possession and brought into the trust fund for divers and sundry reasons, many of which I believe would bear scrutiny and require explanation. Obviously this construction of the law and this course of conduct opened wide the door for all sorts of pressure, influence, favoritism, manipulation, and fraud. According to the statement made by the present custodian before the House Appropriations Committee on December 12 of last year there had been "nixed" or canceled up to that time 11,665 separate trusts, most of them under the administration of his predecessors. These represented properties which, upon investigation, had been found to be enemy owned, possession demanded, and for some one or another of unexplained reasons not reduced to possession, the trust or proceedings being "nixed" or canceled.

Evidently the custodian exercised by the wholesale the discretion which, he says, was committed to him by the law and by the executive order to determine what enemy owned property within the provisions of the trading with the enemy act should or should not be seized. And in the light of the fact that we find many instances where attorneys and certain financial institutions who received large fees from the custodian for services rendered in connection with enemy owned property were at the same time acting for and representing alien claimants to enemy owned property in the hands of the custodian, contact with which claimants they probably made through association with the Alien Property Custodian, we may well ask whether or not Congress and the American people are not entitled to have a full investigation and disclosure made in relation to the multitude of enemy owned properties which in the exercise of his discretion, as he terms it, he abstained from the landing or, having demanded them, has abstained from reducing them to possession and terminated the proceedings against them without the sanction of Congress and entirely upon his own responsibility.

BOSCH MAGNETO CO.

In my address before this House on April 11 I referred to the American Bosch Magneto Co. Before and since that time much has been said and written concerning this matter. Some time ago, and due to the publicity given to the unusual and illegal features of this transaction, statements, apparently emanating from the office of the Attorney General, indicated that the portals of the penitentiary were being opened to receive the culprits. We are still awaiting official action with a hope only born of irrepressible optimism. From what has recently developed, according to press reports and the record of the other branch of Congress, the Attorney General is more successful in getting criminals out of jail than he is in getting them into jail. However, this is a digression from what I started to say.

A few days ago I made a somewhat hasty examination of the report of the present Alien Property Custodian transmitted to the Senate on April 10, 1922. Up to the time I examined this report I had supposed, and indeed I presume everyone else familiar with the facts had supposed, that the former custodian had sold the Bosch Magneto property to Martin E. Kern. Indeed, I am safe in saying that the custodian, who conducted the sale, was of the view that the purchaser was Martin E. Kern. At the time the sale was made Mr. Joseph F. Duffey was the sales manager for the custodian. At that time Mr. Francis P. Garvan was the director of the bureau of investigation and manager of the New York office of the custodian. Mr. Otto Barnard and Mr. George L. Ingraham were members of the advisory sales board. The following is a copy of an official document which is or should be in the files of the custodian's office:

[Alien Property Custodian, Sixteenth and P Streets NW., Washington, D. C. 110 West Forty-second Street, New York City.]

JANUARY 7, 1919.

JOSEPH F. DUFFEY,
Sales Manager, Bureau of Sales,
Alien Property Custodian, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I have made a complete investigation into the circumstances surrounding the sale of the Bosch Magneto Co. and the character of the purchaser.

I have examined the letters of Hornblower & Weeks and those of J. Harry Covington, counsel for Martin E. Kern, dated January 6, 1919, and in view of my investigations and the filing of these letters I beg to recommend that the bureau of sales O. K. the sale to Howard E. Griffith as agent of Martin E. Kern, of Allentown, Pa.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) FRANCIS P. GARVAN,
Director Bureau of Investigation.

We hereby approve the sale of the Bosch Magneto Co. as to purchaser.

OTTO BARNARD.
GEORGE L. INGRAHAM.

NEW YORK, January 7, 1919.

I understand also that the official documents which are or should be in the files of the Alien Property Custodian will show that the transfers of this property were made to Martin E. Kern, to whom possession was delivered. Evidently Mr. Garvan, Mr. Barnard, and Mr. Ingraham had no doubt as to the identity of the purchaser. Evidently these gentlemen thought they were approving a sale to a gentleman by the name of Martin E. Kern, of Allentown, Pa. This is the same gentleman who was quoted in the Washington Times, on page 3 of its issue of January 29 of this year, to the effect that he thought he had discovered that the Bosch Magneto Co. in the hands of its former owners was not dealing patriotically with the United States, and, to quote his own language:

I thereupon used my influence with A. Mitchell Palmer, who had been my lawyer and with whom I was acquainted, owing to our contiguous estates, to place Arthur T. Murray at the head of the company, which he did.

More recently it appeared, or so the facts seem to be, that Mr. Kern is not an American citizen and that he had served three terms in penal institutions in the State of New York. It also appeared that his last conviction and incarceration occurred while Mr. Garvan was assistant district attorney in the city and county where Mr. Kern had been thrice convicted.

Now, subdivision 4 of section 12 of the trading with the enemy act as amended, among other things, provided:

That any property sold under this act, except when sold to the United States, shall be sold only to American citizens.

Other provisions prescribe a penalty for any violation of the act of a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both, and additionally that the property shall be forfeited to the United States. So it would appear that the sale to Mr. Kern was a criminal offense, and subjected the property to forfeiture; that is, subjected whatever interest the purchaser obtained to forfeiture. Forfeiture does not seem to be discretionary with any official. The law is imperative. The language is:

And the property shall be forfeited to the United States.

Well, the sale was made about two years and a half ago, and nobody has yet been prosecuted, no proceedings for the forfeiture of the purchase have been begun.

Now, it seems from an examination of the report of the present custodian, to which I have referred, that Mr. Garvan and Mr. Barnard and Mr. Ingraham and Mr. Palmer, and even Mr. Kern, as well as the rest of us, were mistaken in supposing that the property was in fact sold to Mr. Kern. The report mentioned, when it comes to the Bosch Magneto Co., does not follow the formula used with reference to other sales, which merely advises as to the date of a sale, the consideration, and the name of the purchaser. When it comes to dealing with the Bosch Magneto sale it speaks of "participants in the purchase of Bosch Magneto Co.," followed by a list of about 115 names of persons and companies, among which that of Martin E. Kern is inconspicuously placed down near the middle of the list. The names of many distinguished financiers appear on this list. Among others, a member of the Morgan banking firm; also, a then president of a New York trust company; also, the firm of Hornblower & Weeks; and several others whose alleged interest as participants in the purchase might in a measure explain the failure of the present custodian and present Attorney General to take such legal action as the facts would seem to require.

Now, the fact is that after Mr. Kern purchased the property he organized a new company, called the American Bosch Magneto Co., to which he transferred the property, and I venture to say that the individuals and concerns who are listed by the present custodian as participants in the purchase were merely subscribers to or purchasers of stock in the new company. Evidently somebody put something across on the present custodian and induced him to print a list of such stockholders as participants in the purchase in order to exclude, so far as possible, the personality and the record of Mr. Kern from the transaction.

However, if what the present custodian says in his report is in accordance with the facts, the gentlemen involved have but fled from one difficulty only to encounter another and equally serious one. Clearly the official records made up in the office of the Alien Property Custodian disclosed Martin E. Kern as the purchaser. The law, among other things, provides that—

Any person purchasing property from the Alien Property Custodian for an undisclosed principal—and so forth, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for more than two years, or both, and, quoting the language of the statute—

The property shall be forfeited to the United States.

L. VOGELSTEIN & CO.

The case of L. Vogelstein & Co. will be mentioned as typical of some of the transactions that make an investigation imperative. If you will read a report of the custodian for the period ending February 15, 1919, you will find a chapter devoted to the metal situation and to the relation of German interests thereto. From the first paragraph of this chapter I quote the following:

To appreciate what has been accomplished in ridding the metal industry of the United States of the influences of the so-called "German metal octopus" it is necessary to briefly sketch the growth of the German metal concerns on their native soil and then to point out how these gradually invaded foreign markets and to what extent the American metal markets came under their domination. * * *

The octopus was spreading his tentacles across the Atlantic, but he had not yet assumed the "octopian" proportion.

The Alien Property Custodian has taken over the German-owned metal concerns in the United States, and by disbanding some and Americanizing others it is believed the German influences in our metal markets have been completely eliminated.

Now, one of the octopi which is referred to at length in this chapter was Aaron Hirsch & Son, of Germany, and its alter ego in this country was L. Vogelstein & Co. L. Vogelstein & Co. was capitalized at $5,000,000. Its assets were probably worth several times that amount. Its net profits on the business transacted in the United States in 1916 was $3,000,000. Not long after the trading with the enemy act was passed the entire business and assets of Vogelstein & Co. were taken over by the custodian as enemy owned. Keeping in mind the capitalization of this company, the probable value of its assets, and the volume of its business as indicated by its profits in 1916, I will now proceed briefly to state what subsequently happened in relation to this concern.

Certain lawyers, whose names appear in the official records of the Alien Property Custodian's office, were retained by the custodian in connection with the seizure and administration of this property and represented the custodian in connection with the subsequent transactions. One of these same lawyers appears to have represented L. Vogelstein & Co. at the same time, and subsequently filed with the Alien Property Custodian, in behalf of L. Vogelstein & Co., a claim for the return of the seized property. This is one of the attorneys who received from the custodian fees aggregating about $135,000. In any event, under the circumstances I have indicated, the custodian was persuaded that L. Vogelstein & Co. was not German owned, that it merely owed the parent company in Germany a certain amount of money, and all of the capital stock, assets, and business were returned to L. Vogelstein & Co. upon the payment of this alleged indebtedness. I have a mental picture of the lawyer sitting upon one side of the table, representing the custodian in this transaction, and sitting on the other side of the table representing L. Vogelstein & Co., and in the latter capacity using all his logic, his ability—which no doubt is great—and his persuasive ingenuity to convince himself sitting on the other side of the table in the capacity first mentioned that the property of L. Vogelstein & Co. was improperly seized and should be released. The situation was somewhat camouflaged by an arrangement by which the shares of stock in L. Vogelstein & Co., after their return or release, should be put in a voting trust for a term of years; but this camouflage does not conceal the true and sinister character of the transaction.

In addition to what is contained in the chapter on the metal situation to which I have referred, the report of the former Alien Property Custodian, on page 357, states that L. Vogelstein & Co. was 100 per cent enemy owned.

There is another interesting feature; the attorney to whom I have referred, in a communication which may be found in the files of the Alien Property Custodian, states in substance that as the result of the arrangements which were made the Alien Property Custodian had received in money and securities from L. Vogelstein & Co., as representing the alleged indebtedness to the parent company in Germany, $3,076,100.20, while the report of the present Alien Property Custodian on page 582 states the amount received by the custodian to be $2,164,088, or a discrepancy of $912,012.20. In other words, on the face of the figures, it would appear that the custodian has received and reported as being in the trust fund about $912,000 less than the attorney, who acted in the dual capacity, states was paid over by L. Vogelstein & Co.

Furthermore, it is safe to say that, whichever amount be the correct one, the custodian received upon the release of these properties but a small fraction of their value, notwithstanding he had seized and held and listed them as 100 per cent enemy owned after full investigation.

If another war should come and another Alien Property Custodian should be appointed for such emergency, every person who has the desire to be endowed with sudden wealth should be a lawyer and patriotically volunteer to serve as one of the aids of the custodian. If you will read the report of one of the former custodians for the period ending February 15, 1919, you will be entertained; your fancy will be engaged; your interest and your attention will be intrigued by the flowing style, the sonorous diction, and the beautiful and touching encomiums which he piles lavishly upon himself and the patriotic members of his staff, particularly the lawyers who served him at such manifestly pathetic sacrifice of their own private interests. Caught in the magnificent swing of that official document, touched and exalted by the panegyrics pronounced upon the patriots of the office of the Alien Property Custodian, the soldiers who served upon the battle fields of Europe, who merely offered, and in all too great numbers, gave their lives, their health, their future in behalf of their country must feel ashamed of the pitiful insignificance of their sacrifices.

What has the Alien Property Custodian done in appreciation of and to requite the services of these noble patriots who so freely volunteered their services to aid him in his work? If you will examine the report recently submitted by the present Alien Property Custodian, you will find that five of the most conspicuous of these patriots received but the insignificant sum of $697,000 for their prodigious labors. This sum would pay the salaries of an equal number of Congressmen for between 18 and 19 years. The amount received by these five men, who, by the way, were only employed occasionally and not continuously, would exceed the pay of more than 1,600 soldiers while fighting in France for a year. One lawyer received upward of $170,000, another $137,000 and upward, and another $135,000 and upward, two or three more each an amount exceeding $100,000. Others either less patriotic or less favored were forced to be content with paltry amounts, such as $75,000, $73,000, $71,000, $54,000, $43,000, and so on through a long list. There is only one good reason that occurs to me at this time why we should not investigate these matters, and that is that the facts are too shameful to be exposed to public view.

I recall reading some time ago in the RECORD of the hearings before one of the committees of this House the glowing praise Mr. Garvan heaped upon a gentleman whom he referred to as the "fighting Ramsey Hoguet." This gentleman had ably assisted Mr. Garvan in the Chemical Foundation Co. matter and had become one of its counsel after the organization of the company. One might reasonably draw the inference from what Mr. Garvan said in that hearing that the "fighting Ramsey Hoguet" had performed prodigious labors for the common good in connection with matters under the charge of the Alien Property Custodian without profit to himself and with reimbursements insufficient to cover clerical expenses. Manifestly, the enthusiasm of Mr. Garvan on that occasion in behalf of his colaborer in the Chemical Foundation affair obscured his recollection of the facts, because it would appear that the "fighting Ramsey Hoguet" in the matter of fees, paid, of course, out of trust properties, or the Public Treasury, had received something over $73,000. Thus were the "fighting" qualities of one great warrior well and generously rewarded.

If you will examine further the report recently submitted by the present custodian you will find another very interesting, not to say extraordinary and scandalous, situation. Scores of lawyers who were employed by the Alien Property Custodian have represented in the past and are now representing claimants to property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian.

Every one of the lawyers who received the large fees to which I have referred repeatedly represented claimants before the office of the Alien Property Custodian, and in a number of instances at the very time they were employed by the custodian. There are instances disclosed by the report where the lawyers who represented the custodian in connection with the seizure and administration of enemy-owned property passed over to the other side and successfully represented claimants in securing a release of such property, and it is of more than passing significance that many of these same lawyers to whom the big fees were paid have been unusually successful in persuading the custodian to release enemy property. It has been stated upon excellent authority, with names and amounts given, that some of these lawyers who have been the recipients of such generous favors at the hands of the custodian have in turn received fees running into hundreds of thousands of dollars in securing the return of property from the custodian, and that such services have been rendered upon contingent-fee contract, a species of employment which, to my mind, under the circumstances, is open to the most serious criticism. And the recent report of the custodian shows this condition still continues to exist—a reproach, a scandal, and a menace to the decent and orderly administration of the public business. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have laid before the House some very serious charges against the Alien Property Custodians, past and present. If I have been misled, if the charges I have made are unfounded, if I have not spoken the truth, there is only one thing for the present Alien Property Custodian to do, and that is to appear before the Rules Committee and demand that it report out favorably the resolution of investigation I have to-day introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry, but we have not got the time to yield.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. How does the time stand on general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has 35 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has 30 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Are we going to continue the discussion of such important matters as these with only a few Members present? Is that the idea?

Mr. MADDEN. We are going to finish the general debate. It will take only about an hour. We want to finish the work that we have to do by next Thursday, so that we can all go home.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. MADDEN. This is all by general consent. We are going to stay here until we finish this general debate.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if, as a matter of fact, he is making any effort to get a rule so that these matters may be investigated?

Mr. MADDEN. I have nothing to do with that. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the committee do now rise.

The questing being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 5, noes 32.

Mr. VOIGT. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 12091, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, when 146 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The CHAIRMAN. When the point of no quorum was made the committee was dividing on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, may I express the hope that Members will remain and maintain a quorum in the committee until we conclude the general debate on the bill? I think, as a matter of fact, we ought to pass the bill to-night. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I find it rather difficult to understand the motives that actuate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], who has just spoken, in his attack on the Attorney General and the Alien Property Custodian. His attacks are based on the theory that during the last Democratic administration there was a great deal of fraud, a very great amount of evil doing, and that the Attorney General and the Alien Property Custodian have not been sufficiently swift in ferreting out these alleged or actual evildoers and punishing them.

In the first place, while I have been rather caustic in my criticism of the former administration at one time and another, I am not willing to believe and never have believed that all of the fraud that has been charged at one time and another was practiced, or that all the crimes that have been charged were actually committed. Furthermore, I know, and I think every gentleman who has cared to inform himself knows, that both the Alien Property Custodian and the Attorney General have since their appointment been diligently investigating charges that have been made of fraud and irregularities. Very properly, neither of them has advertised the work they were doing. It would not have been wise or proper for them to have done so, first, because it is not fair to charge men with evil doing unless you have very definite grounds for such charges, and, second, to have advertised what they were doing, or the work they were undertaking, the methods they were pursuing, the facts they were securing, would have served no other purpose than to give notice to those persons who were being investigated, and by so doing give them an opportunity to arrange a defense and do all or any of those things which men do to avoid punishment.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I have only five minutes. Now, we are bound to take it for granted that the gentleman from Michigan is acting in good faith, but we all know that if we were to do what he asks to have done—that is, ask the Attorney General and the Alien Property Custodian and others to turn aside from their regular duties, to suspend their investigations, to give up for the time the ferreting out of evil deeds and appear before congressional committees of investigation—we would to the extent to which we demanded their time for this purpose, retard the very investigations and prosecutions which the gentleman from Michigan says he desires to have carried on.

Furthermore, these investigations would serve to place those who were under suspicion on notice and thus afford them opportunities that would be helpful to their case and possibly afford them a splendid opportunity for setting up a claim of immunity. It is true the gentleman from Michigan will be able to say, when these investigations have been concluded, when cases shall have been brought to trial, when final action shall be taken with regard to the evil doing that he complains of: "I told you so; they did it because I prodded them; there would not have been a thing done if I had not prodded them; and there was not a thing done until I did prod them."

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois give me two minutes more?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield; my time is brief. The gentleman will be able to sing the time-honored refrain, "I told you so, I told you so," and he will claim the credit, I suppose, for all that the Attorney General's force has been doing from the beginning of the administration; he will declare that nothing would have been undertaken, nothing would have been carried forward, nothing would have been accomplished except for his prodding. As a matter of fact, so far as I know, what he has said and what he has done have simply tended to encourage those who were under suspicion. It certainly has not had the effect of advancing prosecutions. [Applause.] I know that the very cases he mentioned have been under consideration for months, but those who are investigating them are not heralding the facts abroad.

I am not one of those who hope that a lot of men will be found to have been guilty of fraud. I hope that comparatively few will be found to have been guilty of actual fraud. I hope that all who have been guilty will be proven guilty, but I am not one of those who hope that a great many men were guilty of deliberate fraud. I think there was, however, grievous wrongdoing, and I hope it will all be punished. These matters are now under consideration, and in due time they will be brought to a proper conclusion, but the attacks such as the gentleman from Michigan is making are not helping the cause of justice or aiding in the punishment of crime. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a Member of this House who wants to protect anybody in wrongdoing. I do not believe the membership of this House is made up of men of that kind. I do know that both sides are prone to play a great deal of politics and say a great many things about the other man's administration and then rush to the defense of their own. I presume that is human nature. This is all right. Each side should criticise the other. It is healthy for both.

I knew Mitchell Palmer intimately and so did many of you in this House. I do not believe that any man who served here with Mitchell Palmer thinks that there is a dishonest bone in him or a dishonest thought about him. He was a man of high standing in this House. He enjoyed the confidence of both sides. You may not agree with him politically, but I know you think that he is an honest man. [Applause.] I am sure of his honesty. In my opinion he is also a man of great ability as well as a man of integrity.

I would have a great contempt for any Member of this House who wanted to take the engines of prosecution and use them to the hurt of an innocent man. I think one of the greatest crimes on earth is to take an honest man and connect him up with dishonesty for political purposes when there is no ground for it but because he has held public office. It is a crime unless you have absolute proof. You not only do the official a very great injustice, but you have done your Government a great injustice. People throughout this country now are too prone to believe that men in high office, men holding high official positions, are dishonest. If this is carried too far it will overturn the Government even if it is untrue. I believe I can truthfully say that of the several hundred men that I have known besides those with whom I am now serving, there is but one man with whom I have served about whom I had any suspicion in respect to honesty and integrity, and I may be wrong about him.

A MEMBER. Who is the gentleman looking at?

Mr. SISSON. Well, he is not in this Congress. [Applause and laughter.] He has been out a long time. I might tell you privately who he is, but I do not want to do even him an injustice. This House has given to the Attorney General $500,000 for the purpose of prosecuting wrong wherever he finds it, and every Democrat, so far as I know, voted for that resolution. As I look into the faces of these men with whom I serve here every day, if I were called upon to put my hand upon a man who is dishonest, who I think would steal directly or indirectly from the public funds, then, if I put my hand on the shoulder of the wrong man, God was to strike me down like Ananias and Sapphira because I had lied, I would hate to put my hand out. Everybody in the United States almost is prone to jump on Congress. Everybody has a right to kick us and say mean things about us, not only individually but as a body. As a rule, I think public officials are honest men. In any event, can we not exercise the same presumption about a man in public office that the law requires us to exercise in respect to a man in private life? He is presumed honest until the contrary is shown. A man who runs the gantlet of a congressional election for several terms, with all the boys out looking for bad places in his record, is usually all right when he gets here, and such a one surely will be generous enough to indulge the presumption with reference to his colleagues and other officials. You will find that the people do not make very many mistakes in sending people to Congress, so far as honesty and integrity is concerned. I think in the last election they made some horrible mistakes in the exercise of judgment, but not because the men were dishonest. However, I think the next election will right that wrong and the thing will be reversed. [Applause and laughter.]

A MEMBER. Very little applause.

Mr. SISSON. That is true, a lack of Democratic enthusiasm. [Applause.] But I did not find very much applause on that side when a gentleman over there, sotto voce, criticized my not having received Democratic applause. I really believe in Members applauding their own side. I believe I am a partisan, and I do not have very much respect for a man who does not have convictions enough to be a partisan, if he is a good, honest one. But, gentlemen, I am talking about something I did not have any idea in the world of talking about. Mr. MONDELL made some statements and I thought I would say a word in his defense——

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. If a congressional investigation were ordered and some of these alleged culprits would appear before the committee and testify, would there not be danger of their claiming immunity later when a prosecution came on?

Mr. SISSON. Of course, that might be true. When a man is compelled to testify under oath to a competent body, of course, unless he did so voluntarily, he would be immune.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That question was debated very carefully when the Graham committee was organized, and it did not stand in the way at that time of that investigation?

Mr. SISSON. But the courts have not passed upon that action. I believe when a man is called upon under pains and penalties of perjury and compelled to give testimony that under the Constitution of the United States he is exempt from prosecution if by and under such oath he divulges matters that should not be divulged but for that oath, I think he is exempt from prosecution for the matters so divulged. That is my opinion.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. Thoroughly agreeing with my friend with reference to his statement as to a man who has run the gauntlet of being elected to Congress several times, is not that testimony in favor of the present Attorney General who has selected men we know and with whom we associated in the Congress—taking one from the Senate and two from this body—to prosecute these people who are alleged to have violated the laws?

Mr. SISSON. I think without hesitation that we ought to presume that the Attorney General is endeavoring to do his duty until the contrary is shown. [Applause.]

Mr. TINCHER. There is no Member of Congress who would charge Frank Reavis or McCullough, who were in this body, of being anything else but upright, reliable, honest men, or Senator Thomas, of Colorado.

Mr. SISSON. I think absolutely these gentlemen whom the gentleman mentions, one in the Senate and two from the House, are men of honesty and integrity. I tell you I would have great contempt for any Attorney General of any party who pushed his prosecutions and indictments unless he would take into consideration all the evidence and the character of the case against the citizenship of this country. [Applause.] Because you can just as successfully destroy an innocent man—and it is a worse crime to destroy him by an unlawful prosecution than it is to let a guilty man escape—and it is upon that principle that liberty rests. Convict a man; yes. Convict him if he is a guilty man under the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt and moral certainty; but never convict him unless so proven guilty, and I hope my record in this House is such that no man will believe I will in any way court wrongdoing on the part of any man.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman's record is good.

Mr. SISSON. Gentlemen, I had intended to talk to you a little about the expenditures and about my attitude in reference to the expenditure of public funds, but the hour is extremely late and I am not going to do that, but I will say before I conclude my remarks that I believe I speak the truth when I say that every man who served on a subcommittee with me, every man who served on the Committee on Appropriations with me, every man who served on a conference committee with me, will say that I have made every effort to be nonpartisan in the appropriation of public funds, and by the exercise of the ability which God gave me have tried to keep the expenses down. [Applause.] And I believe also that they will bear testimony that I have made an effort to protect the taxpayers of America from high and unjust taxes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. As one who has had the privilege of serving on two subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations and on one committee of conference, upon a strenuous occasion, with the gentleman from Mississippi, it gives me pleasure to confirm absolutely what the gentleman says. I have deemed him one of the real economists in this House, and his outstanding ability is recognized by us all. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman. Gentlemen, I do not believe any man makes a mistake, when an appropriation is of doubtful propriety, by voting against it. In the appropriation of public funds I feel that every dollar appropriated should be appropriated as a sum absolutely necessary for public use; and if it is not, he who votes does a wrong tantamount to a crime. I am afraid of a man if he is careful about spending his own money and very reckless about spending the people's money. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the hour is late. I have talked longer than I ought; I therefore yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is said that variety is the spice of life, and I have now to introduce some variety by asking you to hear me just a few minutes on a matter we have not heretofore considered in this body, to wit, the subject of birds.

I did not introduce that subject to this Congress, and I am sorry it was ever introduced in the form in which it has been presented. In May, 1921, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], away out yonder where I thought there were no birds, introduced a bill known as H. R. 5825, providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them.

The bill brought great alarm to the hearts of many of my constituents, and I am commanded by my duty to them in this limited opportunity to speak to it. Hearings were had by the Committee on Agriculture, to which it was referred, and strange to say, wonderful to behold, that committee reported to this House that the bill ought to pass. In the face of the great questions of national importance pressing upon the consideration of this Congress, reviewed so aptly by my colleague, Mr. POU, yesterday, the Committee on Rules has reported a rule favoring the immediate consideration of this bill. The destiny of Muscle Shoals and of ship subsidies and of all such questions of great national importance, which the public mind is pressing with such anxious impatience upon the consideration of this Congress, have been relegated to the rear and the bird bill has been given a rule as of superior importance to those great measures, and so shortly you will be called upon to vote upon this question.

The bill provides that there shall be a commission appointed consisting of Members of each House of the Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, whose duties it shall be to secure, lay off, survey, and set apart reservations of land or water wherein no man shall hunt or shoot unless he shall first obtain a license from the Agricultural Department. For that license he shall pay $1, and the manner of obtaining it and the conditions upon which it is issued and the regulations upon which he shall exercise it are prescribed up here in the Agricultural Department.

Under one of the provisions of this bill a man who is found on one of these reservations without a license and in any way violating one of the regulations, if he is in possession of a single bird's egg as big as the end of my thumb, can be arrested without warrant by an agent of the Agricultural Department and carried, if need be, across a dozen counties to a Federal commissioner, by this commissioner bound over to a Federal grand jury, and there indicted and put on trial, and the Federal judge must sign and enter a judicial decree determining the proper custody and possession and property of such bird's egg, whether it be the property of the defendant, and if not, adjudging it to be the property of the Agricultural Department. See section 12 of the bill, page 8, from line 5 to line 4 on page 9.

How commanding, awe-inspiring, and wonderful as a display of governmental power and authority it will be to stand in the presence of an august tribunal, presided over by a Federal judge, and see him and his assistant officers adjudicate title and rightful possession of the egg of a brant! In section 13 of this bill there is a segregable proposition and sentence, under which a man may be indicted for disturbing any fish within one of these Federal reservations; and I state it here and now, as a man and a lawyer, staking upon its correctness whatever reputation as either man or lawyer I have with my constituents, that if a district attorney should write a bill of indictment in the following words, "The grand jurors of the Government on their oaths present that A B, late of the county of Currituck and State of North Carolina, and in the eastern district of said State, being willfully and unlawfully in a certain Federal reservation, did unlawfully disturb a certain fish, to wit, a black bass, by throwing a club at him, contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the United States," that bill of indictment could not be quashed, but under this bill, if it should become a law, is sustainable; and if under the bill it should be found by the jury that he was on that reservation and wantonly took a club and threw it into the water and caused disturbance to a fish, he may be fined $50 and imprisoned six months. [Laughter.] See section 15, page 10, from line 6 to line 16.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this matter is too serious to be laughed at in the American Congress. I submit that the people of this country have been so annoyed, pricked, nagged, and aggravated by penal laws and by the piling up of penalties for every imaginable act, word, and deed that their patience and submission are hardly able to bear up under them longer.

Already there is sufficient law for the protection of all kinds of birds. I favor the spirit and purpose of such laws. Birds of all kinds ought to be protected against wanton and extravagant destruction. In furtherance of this purpose the Congress has passed laws under which a man may be indicted and imprisoned six months for killing a single catbird, because he is a songster, even if that bird is eating his own raspberries. Already it is the law that if a man holding a dozen dead migratory birds in his hand at the groceryman's door should exchange one of them with the groceryman for a pound of flour, sugar, coffee, or any other article of food with which to eat one or more of the other 11, he may be imprisoned in a Federal prison for six months.

Are not such extreme Federal statutes as these quite sufficient circumspection and limitation upon the ordinary, natural, and almost irresistible conduct of the citizen to protect birds as far as their protection is necessary, and do they not go as far as the Congress ought to go in circumscribing the conduct of the citizen? Where and when, I ask, will the Congress ever stop in saying what men shall and shall not do in their natural and necessary everyday walks of life, and where and when will it ever stop in establishing courts to try them, building prisons to hold them, fixing penalties to punish them, and appointing foreign officers and departmental agents to arrest them without warrant, and search their secret precincts and possessions? How can the people be expected to obey such a network of laws that surround them on every hand to nag, to gnaw, to nibble, to tease, to irritate, to pester, and to annoy them? Such laws give no inspiration and create no conception of "awe and majesty wherein doth lie respect for government." They destroy respect for government, and they have done much and are constantly doing much to destroy respect for law and government.

No wonder the people are restless and discontented with their Government. No wonder political parties succeed each other in power with each recurring election. No wonder there is Bolshevism, socialism, and every form of public discontent all over the land. Once surround the citizenship of the country with a system of restraints upon his conduct and his natural rights, forbid him doing the things his forefathers did before him without question, and the things he has been doing all his life that have in them no possible sense of inherent wrong, surround him with penalties for the things he was trained to think God had given him a right to do, and then smite him with the hand of governmental power and expect him, like a whipped dog, to come up and lick the hand that smites him, and you will find when it may be too late the difference between the man and the dog. You are simply doing all that government can do to convert a patriot into an anarchist.

This bill authorizes the search of the sacred precincts of a home, by an agent of the Agricultural Department, unbonded and unsworn, to find a dead brant or a duck egg. Think of a North Carolina woman, standing there in her home, with her little ones about her, where she thought she was protected by her great Government from invasion and trespass, looking on the beautiful and inspiring spectacle of an agent of the Agricultural Department prowling through her bureau drawers to see if her husband has hid a dead brant or a goose egg in them. Pass this bill as it is written and I solemnly declare that it authorizes exactly that thing exactly as I state it. God Almighty save the mark! [Applause.]

What, now, is the real purpose and intent of this bill, and why was it inspired? Is it this: The sportsman, whose inherited fortunes have removed him far from life's duties, responsibilities, and cares, has purchased an island in the waters, say, of Currituck Sound, N. C.—and other waters are similar—and on it he has built a home and stocked it with all the things that luxury and ease and sport and revelry can suggest. In this island home he "tastes the spices of Arabia, but feels not the sun or showers that produce them." Around this island for several miles it may be is very shallow water and shoals. His riparian and other rights extend far out to deep water. He has difficulty in using the local courts to enforce protection of his shooting ground. He wants to turn these islands and shooting grounds over to the United States, pay his license, and get the United States Government to protect them by its regulations and through its courts. I know whereof I speak. I have been in touch with just these conditions, and for several years I did my best to enforce rigid State laws for the protection of migratory birds and the property rights of those who enjoyed peculiar privileges in the shooting of them. I found it difficult. Juries act reluctantly and call for, sometimes, most too much proof before they convict on such indictments. But pass this bill and the club owner and sporting man will raise the song of the southern negro, "All 'er my troubles am done away. I will turn these lands and waters over to the Government and go to the Agriculture Department and get a network of regulations governing shooting on them and get an agent of the Agriculture Department to come down here and wine and dine with me and he will pick up these fellows—he will not need any warrant—and carry them away to a United States commissioner and have him bound over to the Federal court and make him come to that court to get a trial three or four times, 100 miles away from his home, and by that time I have done enough to him not to care whether he is convicted." That is what is in this bill. It is a piece of tyranny and of sportsman despotism that no English lord would have asked for the protection of his manor in the thirteenth century. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the Washington Herald of this morning contains on the first page an article purporting to cover an address by Congressman WOODRUFF, of Michigan, made last night before the George Washington Post of the American Legion. The article carries a heading, "Got goods on Daugherty." A second heading reads, "Representative charges Attorney General put war-fraud cases in hands of slackers."

The article contains the following language:

Charging that Attorney General Daugherty has put into the hands of a few slackers the duty of investigating war-fraud cases, and asserting that those in the Department of Justice who really have the interests of the Nation at heart are not allowed to investigate any cases except those which have been put into their hands by those higher up, Representative ROY O. WOODRUFF, of Michigan, last night declared before the George Washington Post of the American Legion that a change was needed in the Department of Justice.

The newspaper purports to quote the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] as follows:

Our Attorney General has been in office 14 months now; his archives are crammed with war-fraud cases, with enough evidence to warrant indictments, and still he has taken no action.

The article further purports to quote the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] as follows:

It is a well-known fact that when I threatened to move the impeachment of Mr. Daugherty if he did not get after the Lincoln Motors case, in which the Government overpaid the company more than $9,000,000, he got some action quick. Why can't this be done in all cases?

The paper further states that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] concluded by declaring that—

Mr. Daugherty may soon be stirring now, because he knows very well that we have the goods on him.

Assuming that the above quotations are substantially correct, I wish to take just enough of the time of the House to say that in my judgment such unwarranted statements serve the purpose of defeating rather than promoting speedy and exact justice being administered to war profiteers.

I was privileged to serve for two years on the so-called Walsh committee, which investigated some of the war expenditures. My experiences on that committee convinced me of the necessity of careful and thorough preparation on behalf of the Government before actions were begun. The American people want prosecution of war profiteers. Our efforts can better be used toward aiding rather than discrediting that department. The present Attorney General was a personal and intimate friend of Senator John Sherman, Senator M. A. Hanna, Senator J. B. Foraker, President McKinley, and is not entirely unknown to President Harding. Ohioans may well await with interest the results of an organized effort to discredit a worthy public official.

Congress has recently appropriated $500,000 for investigation and prosecution. This new bureau is in the process of organization, and, in my judgment, it ill becomes Members of Congress to attempt to hamstring this bureau before it has scarcely had time to get in action. I have known Attorney General Daugherty for the past 20 years. I do not believe he has put into the hands of a few slackers the duty of investigating war fraud cases. No one who knows Mr. Daugherty will believe that statement. I am reliably informed that among the list of special assistants to the Attorney General who have been assigned to investigate and prosecute war frauds may be found Col. Henry W. Anderson, Col. William T. Champland, Col. Guy D. Goff, and Lieut. C. Leon Downing, all in the recent war, and, I dare say, with military records which would not suffer by comparison with that of distinguished gentlemen who make these charges against the Attorney General. How many other members of the bureau investigating and prosecuting war frauds were in the recent war I do not know, but it is evident that the facts do not bear out the charge that the Attorney General has put into the hands of a few slackers the duty of investigating war fraud cases.

The gentleman from Michigan is credited with having said:

It is a well-known fact that when I threatened to move the impeachment of Mr. Daugherty * * * he got some action quick.

Has it ever occurred to the gentleman from Michigan that this very same action might have happened at exactly the same time and in exactly the same manner, even had he not so courageously announced his threat of impeachment? It is quite possible that even a Member of this distinguished body may at times take himself entirely too seriously. [Applause.]

Then he is credited with the statement—

Mr. Daugherty may soon be stirring now, because he knows very well that we have the goods on him.

I submit that it does not require a very high degree of courage or foresight to predict activities on behalf of a bureau, created under congressional appropriation, to investigate and prosecute war frauds. The gentleman is further quoted as having said last night:

In a very few days I shall get after former Alien Property Custodians A. Mitchell Palmer and Francis P. Garvan.

Has it not occurred to the gentleman from Michigan that the Department of Justice might have equal facilities with him for ascertaining the facts surrounding these Alien Property Custodians? Action will come in due time, I predict, while his resolution peacefully sleeps.

I have no desire to question the right of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] to make whatever charges, in whatever manner he sees fit. I am not trying to disparage his motives or deter his line of action, but I do submit that in fairness to the present administration and in fairness to one of the great branches of this Government no Member of Congress should in haste commit himself to such charges as the daily press credit to the gentleman from Michigan.

May it not be possible that powerful interests, fearful of war frauds investigations are making systematic efforts to discredit the Department of Justice? May not the gentleman from Michigan unintentionally and unwittingly be lending his efforts in aid of this scheme? That there is such a scheme every American with an open mind must discern. However, anyone who knows the present Attorney General knows that no such efforts will ever swerve him from his line of duty. During 30 years' active participation in politics, Harry Daugherty never struck below the belt. He is a hard fighter, but a fair fighter. Those who are hoping to discredit his administration and thereby prevent prosecutions are doomed to a great disappointment.

In 1912 I resigned as secretary of the Republican State Committee and served as secretary of the Progressive State Committee in Ohio. Mr. Daugherty led the Taft fight. It was a spirited contest, but real Progressives lost no respect for Mr. Daugherty. It was my pleasure to sign his petition for United States Senator four years later. The struggle of 1912 had left no ill feeling, because Mr. Daugherty was a hard fighter, but a fair fighter. I predict that the gentleman from Michigan, as well as the American public generally will soon conclude, if they have not already done so, that war profiteers will not prevent the present Attorney General from discharging the duties of his office without fear or favor.

It is to be regretted, as I see it, that some of our Chatauqua circuit riders and notoriety seekers have unwittingly contributed to this well-organized scheme to discredit this great branch of our Government. I offer no apology, either for the Department of Justice or for the Attorney General. They need none. I make no defense of either the department or Mr. Daugherty. They need none. I do venture the opinion that in the near future the membership of this body, as well as the country at large, will realize that the Department of Justice is functioning with precision and effectiveness. Surely such a condition is desired by all Americans, save and except our princely war profiteers, and that small but select band of professional elephant chasers.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, on what subject, please?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I intended to make some remarks in answer to something said by my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] this afternoon.

Mr. VOIGT. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. VOIGT. On what subject?

Mr. NORTON. On the condition the country was in when Congress met and what has been accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, when the Republicans came into power, on March 4, 1921, the country was still at war, although more than two years had passed since the armistice. The mills were closed and men were out of employment; cotton piled in the yards throughout the South with no market and the wheat and corn market in even worse condition, so that the farmers were discouraged, surrendering their farms to the mortgagees. Europe was bankrupt and banks were breaking almost daily, some 32 having failed in North Dakota alone. Wages were going down, with about 7,000,000 unemployed looking for work which was not to be had. In short, confidence, which is the basis of trade, was wanting.

United States bonds were selling for 85 cents on the dollar. We had an interest-bearing debt of about $24,000,000,000 with an annual interest of more than a billion dollars; everyone complaining about the nuisance taxes and the internal-revenue taxes generally; the soldiers in need of hospitals, all the shacks in the country being filled to overflowing; and all these conditions existing only 16 months ago when the Republicans came in power.

AND WHAT ARE SOME OF THE THINGS THAT HAVE BEEN DONE DURING THESE 16 MONTHS?

PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Republicans not only passed a resolution declaring a state of peace with Germany, which was opposed almost unanimously by the Democrats, but they have negotiated and ratified a treaty saving all our rights without making entangling alliances or impairing our sovereignty.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The nuisance taxes have been done away with and the internal revenue reduced nearly $200,000,000, and in 1923 will be reduced $790,320,000. The personal exemption for heads of families has been increased from $2,000 for the head of the family and $200 for each minor child to $2,500 for the head of the family and $400 for each minor child on all incomes up to and including $5,000, and this provision affects 60 per cent of the taxpayers. The $60,000,000 tax on cereal beverages was repealed and the war tax on cereal beverages placed at 2 cents per gallon.

HOSPITALIZATION.

Two bills, one for $18,600,000 and the other for $17,000,000, have been passed and the entire proceeds appropriated for the enlarging and building of needed hospitals for the soldiers who served in the World War; about 35,000 soldiers have been provided for, as follows: 12,180 tubercular, with the expectation that 3,500 more will be provided for, making 15,680 in all; present number of neuropsychiatric patients, 8,850, and general medical and surgical cases, 9,084. More than $178,714,182 has been paid out for vocational training and for schooling, support of families, and so forth, and $78,278,930 for medical and hospital service this year.

THE VETERANS' BUREAU.

Of all matters that have come before Congress, those of the soldier deserved and have received the most attention. When the present administration took hold, it found that the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and that part of the United States Public Health Service which has been dealing with the veterans were each under a distinct and separate head, and there was no end to the red tape that had to be unraveled before action could be had on any claim, and in many instances a soldier suffering from the lack of necessities was driven insane before action on his case was had. In fact, these bureaus were more than six months behind. But now the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and that part of the United States Public Health Service which has been dealing with veterans, have been combined into what is known as the Veterans' Bureau with Colonel Forbes at the head, and the red tape is being rapidly dispensed with. The central office is established in the District of Columbia with 14 regional offices and 140 suboffices. All the records have been transferred to the regional offices and now instead of having to make a trip to Washington, soldiers are treated nearer home. Colonel Forbes is a man of action, and the ex-service men are as a class more than pleased with the great change that is taking place—hospitals are being erected, repaired, and made ready—thousands of new beds have been equipped within the past few months, improvements are being made, and the claims of those suffering with injuries received while in the service of their country are receiving prompt attention, and the change meets with the approval of the ex-service men.

REDUCTION OF EXPENSES.

Expenses have been greatly reduced, especially the so-called fixed charges.

The Army appropriation has been reduced $45,000,000 and the Army from 256,000 to 125,000; the Navy appropriation reduced $86,000,000 and the Navy from 110,000 to 86,000; the Shipping Board appropriation has been reduced $76,500,000. We found a debt of $24,000,000,000 and paid the first year, on the principal, $350,000,000.

In 1921 the United States' expenses were $5,538,040,689, while in 1922 they are $3,922,392,000, or $1,615,668,659 less than they were in 1921. During the month of July, 1921, the Government discharged 5,537 civil-service employees more than it employed, and in one year it discharged 71,849.

BUDGET SYSTEM.

What is termed a "Budget system" has been adopted for the first time in the history of our Government, and it is said that this has already resulted in a great saving in the cost of administering the Government in the amount of about $250,000,000.

RELIEF FOR FARMERS.

Knowing the terrible condition the farmers of the West and South are in owing to the great drop in the price of all agricultural products, their crops not selling for enough to pay for the labor expended, and knowing how the entire country is dependent upon the farmer for its sustenance, this problem has received the special attention of Congress.

Several bills have been passed to enable the farmer to secure upon proper security the necessary loans to prevent the great sacrifice that would have resulted from the sudden decline in the value of farm products. A number of protective and improvement measures were also passed, such as the packers' bill, the grain futures bill, and an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the present year and $75,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

SHIPPING BOARD.

The total appropriations for the Shipping Board since its inception amount to $3,306,000,000. During the war robbery was rife on every hand. The Shipping Board alone squandered many millions of dollars. The United States Shipping Board now has 1,500 ships. The entire property of the board has cost the Government $3,306,000,000 and the year before last we lost $200,000,000 in operation. There is now claiming to be from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 owing the board. There are 3,500 lawsuits pending against the Government, with claims of over $350,000,000, so that the face value of the claims nearly exhaust the assets of the company. They wanted an appropriation of $125,000,000 this year, but Congress gave them $48,500,000, cutting the amount $76,500,000. Where there were about 3,000 men employed by the board there are now 1,100.

The number of ships completed before the armistice was 450; the total number completed, 2,288, of which about 389 were wooden ships, which cost $375,000,000 and were absolutely worthless, as were also the 30 concrete ships that were built.

EXCESS SUPPLIES.

We all know what enormous amounts of supplies were purchased at exorbitant prices; that more than 33,000 automobiles were purchased after the armistice was declared, sent to France and sold along with other supplies and goods and it is not generally known that when we undertook to reexport those articles—bring them back home after the war was ended—the French Government asked us more than $150,000,000 import duty, so rather than to pay it, and especially for the purpose of helping France to start anew, we sold goods that had cost us $1,700,000,000 for $400,000,000, or about 25 cents on the dollar, on a 10-year payment plan. Then France, instead of using the goods we sold her to assist her in rehabilitation, sold them to speculators who were sending them back to America by the shipload to sell at a less price than they can be produced here. These speculators were sending these goods back as "American manufactures returned," thereby avoiding the payment of a duty, and in order to prevent them from thus fraudulently underselling goods produced by the American workman Congress passed a bill putting a duty of 90 per cent on such goods and as usual the Democrats voted against it as they have against nearly every bill that has sought to protect the American workman.

TARIFF BILL.

An emergency tariff was passed to prevent the flooding of markets with goods made by cheap labor, and a new tariff bill passed the House on July 21, 1921, and will soon pass the Senate, which will greatly add to our revenue and, I trust, enable our mills to run again to capacity.

FOREIGN LOANS.

A great deal has been said about our foreign loans of about $10,000,000,000, on which there is a billion dollars in interest due. And why do we not collect it? The fact is, when the loans were made bonds were not taken, only memoranda papers; and, besides, the only way we can collect would be to go to war or take the customhouses. Congress, however, said they should pay in full, especially those who have anything with which to pay, and a commission was appointed, consisting of Secretary of the Treasury Andrew J. Mellon, Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of Commerce Herbert C. Hoover, Senators Smoot and Reed, and Congressman Burton, to refund the debts and take bonds to run not more than 25 years, with interest at not less than 4½ per cent.

IMMIGRATION.

Our associations with the allied powers during the recent war seems to have involved us to a certain extent in European and Asiatic matters. Since the Farewell Address of George Washington we have scrupulously avoided such situations. No one doubts but the following of the sound advice given by Washington has prevented this country from being constantly involved in the numerous broils that have disrupted many of the European and Asiatic countries, and while they have fought we have advanced in both wealth and education.

It would seem that the entire world is now at unrest and we are asked to attend meeting after meeting. While it is right and proper that we should aid as far as possible, we must look first to our own country and determine what is best for our own people. A melting pot we have, but we must not stifle the spirit of progress by admitting the hordes from abroad when our own people are seeking work to maintain themselves and their families. Our own firesides demand our first attention.

In 1920 there were 606,292 visés granted and between 50,000 to 60,000 in Warsaw alone were ready to start for America when we enacted what is known as the Johnson 3 per cent immigration law, which limits the number of immigrants per year from each country to 3 per cent of the number of aliens from any given country residing here as shown by the census of 1910. The combined number permitted from all countries is 355,212. The total number of immigrants for the seven months from March 1, 1921, to June 3, 1921, when the law went into effect, was 712,242 and the act to limit immigration kept out from 1,750,000 to 2,000,000 the first year. Without the 3 per cent law last year the net gain in immigrants was 550,000. This fiscal year, with the law in force, the net gain will not exceed 80,000.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

What constitutes intoxicating liquor under the constitutional amendment adopted by 46 States, which is a greater number than ever adopted a constitutional amendment before, is made definite, so that those who sell beer and come within the law will not be subject to arrest and those who deliberately break the law as provided in the Constitution will be subject to punishment.

Prior to the adoption of the law determining what constitutes intoxicating liquor, 30 States had already passed laws fixing the amount of alcohol in beer, wine, and so forth, that would constitute intoxication, some of which States allowed less than that provided in the law passed by Congress, so that what was a crime in one State might not be in another. This was unfortunate for the producer as well as the consumer, and it was essential that some definite amount should be determined upon, and, as many States had fixed one-half of 1 per cent, this was the per cent determined upon in the general law, so that what constitutes intoxicating liquor in one State should in all.

There has never been and probably never will be an amendment to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the eighteenth amendment, which prevents trafficking in intoxicating liquors, was approved by 46 out of 48 States, and this is more than any other amendment was ever approved by, and this, too, before the women had the right to vote, so anyone with any judgment will see how absurd and farcical is the agitation of the liquor question at this or any future time.

Cards are being mailed that say, "Give us beer and wine that is only slightly intoxicating," forgetting that the Constitution prohibits the sale of any beverage that is intoxicating; and it makes no difference how slight, a law that provided for its manufacture or sale would be unconstitutional and void.

Thus the United States statute only defined for all the States what the majority of the States had already agreed upon, so that a crime in one State should be a crime in all, which is not only proper but necessary under the Constitution if law and order are to prevail. The Federal Government has for years compelled the payment of internal revenue tax on beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

If it is not for the reason that light wine and beer are intoxicating, why is there talk of passing a law permitting their sale? And if they are intoxicating, then any law of that kind would be unconstitutional, as the Constitution makes no distinction between slightly intoxicating and very intoxicating. The word used is "intoxicating" with no qualifications.

The wets, as stated by Mr. VOLSTEAD, had only to secure the votes of one-third of either House of Congress or a majority of either branch of the legislatures of 13 States to have prevented the submission and adoption of the eighteenth amendment, while the advocates of the amendment had to obtain two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and a majority of both houses, or 72 in all, of 36 States. In fact, in less than a year and a half the amendment was carried in 92 out of the 96 houses of the 48 legislatures, and only 4 houses failed to approve it.

To repeal or modify the Constitution would require the same number of votes that it did to put it into effect.

Michigan adopted prohibition by a vote of over 68,000. A year later it defeated the sale of wine and beer by a majority of 270,000.

Ohio adopted prohibition in 1918, and when a referendum was taken a year later on permitting the sale of beer containing 2¾ per cent of alcohol the majority against it was increased, and the last referendum election in Ohio, which prohibits the sale of beer and wine that contains more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, was carried by a majority of 290,000 votes, and similar votes have been taken in other States. Are not these facts sufficient to show that the present agitation of the liquor question is a mere camouflage to detract attention from the manufacturers of moonshine and the unlawful sale by the bootleggers?

NARCOTICS.

In June, 1919, the United States Treasury, Department of the Public Health Service, issued a pamphlet showing that the United States was the greatest opium-consuming country on record per capita, consumption being 36 grains per capita, as compared with 1 for Italy, 2 for Germany, and 3 for France.

On May 22, 1922, an act was passed that places a penalty of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than 10 years upon anyone who fraudulently or knowingly imports or brings any narcotic drug into the United States and any Territory under its control or jurisdiction contrary to law, and so forth; also holds the vessel on which imported and prevents its being transported through the United States to any other country, and it is believed that this will practically put an end to its sale in the country.

PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Peace Conference, which adjourned on February 6, 1922, accomplished more in the three months in which it was in session than all the gatherings of that nature did in all past time, and that without the surrendering of sovereignty or an agreement to assist any other country in war.

When it convened it was generally believed that dissension would arise, especially between the representatives from Japan and China, and it was with great misgivings as to results that the convocation met, and yet when it finally adjourned it was with the best of feelings on the part of the representatives of every nation.

Among the important subjects considered were the islands in the Pacific. It has been generally conceded that the United States was in more danger of trouble, especially with Japan, on this account than any other nation. The four-power pact or treaty to keep peace in the Pacific entered into by the United States, the British Empire, Japan, and France is probably the shortest treaty ever made between the leading contracting powers, and yet by its terms, for at least 10 years, it will avert the possible danger of misunderstandings on this subject.

By the treaties not only is war averted so far as the islands in the Pacific are concerned for at least 10 years, but the secret treaty existing between Great Britain and Japan, by which Great Britain had agreed to assist Japan, is abrogated, and the use of gas and submarines without first giving notice is prohibited.

To remove any possible doubt as to our being bound in complicating alliances by the four-power treaty, the following reservation was made to the treaty:

> The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

OTHER LEGISLATION.

Many other important matters of legislation have been considered and acted upon by Congress, among them being the maternity bill; the antilynching bill, which was passed by the House on January 26, 1922, being opposed almost unanimously by the Democrats; the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, which passed the House March 23, 1922, and provides a slight compensation for the great sacrifice each soldier made while many of those who have opposed it were at home profiteering from the soldiers' efforts; the blue sky bill, which passed the House April 28, 1922, and prevents the use of the mails or other interstate commerce from transporting or procuring the sale of fraudulent securities into a State that has a blue sky law, as Ohio and most States have; and the Cable bill, which passed the House June 20, 1922, giving to alien women equal rights with men; and many other bills.

Never before has a party been confronted with such a problem as this administration. When the Civil War ended, we were only indebted two and one-half billions of dollars, while now we owe $23,600,000,000, with an annual interest charge of about $1,000,000,000. Again, when the Civil War ended Europe had an abundance of capital to buy our products, both of the factory and the farm, and immediately invested a large amount of capital here in the construction of railroads and other enterprises, while now they are nearly all practically bankrupt and begging assistance.

We avoided a panic only because the people believed that the Republican Party would do all that a government can do to assist in restoring confidence and placing the Government back on a safe and sound foundation. And in the short period of 16 months, under the wise guidance of the Republican Party, the Government survey shows that confidence has been restored and that business is steadily improving, that there is a large increase in employment as compared with last year, that the production of steel is increasing, prices of staple articles and materials are advancing, interest is falling, and that all the Federal banks report a great improvement in business. The fact that United States bonds, which were selling at 85 cents on the dollar, have gone to par is absolute proof in itself that times are better and that the people generally are satisfied with what the present administration has done and is doing.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FESS). The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, on April 11, 1922, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced a House resolution for the appointment of a select committee to investigate all contracts and expenditures made by the War and Navy Departments and the Alien Property Custodian during the War with Germany. Afterwards that resolution has been discussed upon the floor of the House and Senate repeatedly. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], generally on time yielded by the Democratic side, has addressed himself to the subject on several occasions, and again to-day has alluded to the matters involved in the resolution. Coming from Republican sources, the resolution and the speeches of Mr. WOODRUFF and Mr. JOHNSON have been seized upon largely by Democratic Members in both House and Senate as excuses, and in both Houses the most strenuous demands have been made by them on repeated occasions for an investigation of the Department of Justice and for the passage of this resolution. However worthy may have been the object of the original mover of the resolution, it has been a means toward an end for the Democrats of the Congress. They have filled the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the papers of the country with their denunciations of the Attorney General and his department, knowing full well that all the sentiment they can thus create will militate against the present administration and to Democratic advantage. This resolution has been made a political tool.

They clamor for an investigation. Of what? Of the thieves and grafters that existed under their administration. Thus far I have sat by and listened in silence to this Democratic enthusiasm for investigations. But I now feel that it might be useful from a historical standpoint to look at the Democratic record briefly on the subject of war investigations. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the minority leader, on May 9 last, in advocating the passage of the Johnson resolution, said in speaking of the Wilson administration, in part:

> On every side it was criticized and complained of, but its head, nor any of the heads of departments, although first and last criticized from every partisan angle and standpoint, thank God, never directly or indirectly requested to be excused from a congressional investigation. * * * No Democratic administration ever backed away from an investigation or attempted to avoid it.

These sentiments awakened intense enthusiasm among our Democratic brethren. Let us investigate the records a little on the subject.

In the Sixty-fifth, or "war" Congress, the Senate, seeing the immense expenditures about to be incurred, and desiring to have a committee of Congress to act with the President and executive departments in limiting and regulating war expenditures, attached an amendment to the food control act providing for the appointment of such a bipartisan committee. A similar committee had been appointed in the Civil War in the administration of President Lincoln. President Wilson at once wrote a letter to Mr. Lever, Democratic chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House, in which he said as to this Senate amendment:

> Section 23 is not only entirely foreign to the subject matter of the food administration bill, in which it is incorporated, but would, if enacted into law, render my task of conducting the war practically impossible. I can not believe that those who proposed this section scrutinized it with care or analyzed the effects which its operation would necessarily have. The constant supervision of executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the administration.

That ended the matter. Every Democrat in Congress lined up behind the President. There was no such committee. The appointment of such a committee doubtless would have saved billions of the peoples' money.

When the Sixty-sixth Congress met early in 1919 it was Republican in both branches. One of the first things done was to appoint a committee of 15 to investigate the expenditures of the war. The Democrats selected to act on this committee were five of the best lawyers and leading men they had. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Garrett, present minority leader; Mr. Flood, of Virginia; Mr. Doremus, of Michigan; the gentleman from California, Mr. Lea; and Mr. Donovan, of New York. The Democrats did not oppose the naming of this committee, because manifestly such opposition would have availed nothing in face of the solid Republican majority in the House. They contented themselves, however, with attempting to obstruct the investigation and render it futile in any way possible.

If you are interested, look into one of the 18 volumes of hearings of this committee. Every question asked by the minority members seems to be framed to defend the particular person or interest being investigated. All through the investigation the War Department was hostile and the Department of Justice ignored it. Whenever the committee began to get its hands on some one, all the force of the War Department was exerted in defense, and whitewashing committees exonerated the accused. In all this the Democratic members concurred.

On June 1 last the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] presented to the House a letter from the former Attorney General in which Mr. Palmer, who had found no war frauds to prosecute while Attorney General, said:

> I hope the House will pass the Woodruff resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate all contracts and expenditures made by the War Department, etc., * * * an investigation of the character proposed in the Woodruff resolution might be very helpful to the Congress.

My mind ran back at once to August 11, 1919. The Committee on War Expenditures was investigating Muscle Shoals. We found that the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, had complete daily reports from investigators about conditions there. Thinking to save double expense we sent a trained accountant to inspect these reports for us. Mr. Palmer refused this privilege in a letter, a part of which is:

> * * * The reports and statements made to the Attorney General by his subordinates are regarded as privileged. In harmony with the long-established practice, such reports of matters still under consideration in this department should be treated as confidential within the department. Furthermore, this matter is actively pending and under observation in the department, and I am therefore of the opinion that it would be incompatible with the public interest to permit Mr. Storck and his assistants to inspect such reports that have been made to me from time to time by my agents engaged in the Muscle Shoals investigation.

Thus we observe that what Mr. Palmer would not do in his administration he now insists should be done in the administration of his successor.

Man after man on the Democratic side has risen to ask for this proposed investigation. It is useful to observe what they did and said when the former investigation of these matters was being had. The select committee filed several reports. In every case the Democratic Members filed minority views. Some of these reports were as follows:

On July 28, 1919, the committee reported that there were immense quantities of surplus canned goods on hand in the Army stores, which were spoiling, that the Secretary of War was keeping them off the market by agreement with the packers and asking by resolution that they be sold direct to the people. The Democratic Members in minority views said the arrangement made by the Secretary of War with the packers and canners was proper, said there were no surplus goods, and did all they could to defeat the resolution.

On November 11, 1919, the committee reported on the allowance of claims under the Dent Act, complaining that errors and frauds existed, called attention to specific cases, and presented a resolution calling on the Secretary of War to demand or sue for the sums unjustly paid. These are the same claims where Brigadier General Lord, Chief of Finance, has already discovered $46,000,000 of errors in auditing one-tenth of these claims. The Democratic Members objected. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], Democratic ranking member on the Rules Committee, opposing the rule to bring in this resolution, said:

> The proper thing to do with this resolution is to vote it down. Such an asinine performance as this has never been enacted in this House since I have been a Member.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], in presenting the minority views, said:

> It (the passage of the resolution) will tend to render uncertain the minds of all those business interests throughout the whole United States with whom settlements have been made, and its inevitable effect will be to embarrass and retard the various war claims boards on the one hand and contractors on the other in the negotiations relative to the settlements in the hundreds of cases still pending.

Then, after shedding their tears over the poor contractors, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] concludes:

In view of the foregoing statements of fact and reason, it is felt by the minority that it is extremely regrettable that House Resolution 381 and the report accompanying it, containing the imputations and inferences against trusted officials of the Government and the vast number of respectable and honorable business men with whom these officials have dealt, should be presented to the House, and that if it be brought up for consideration it should be unhesitatingly rejected.

On February 16, 1920, the committee presented a report on aviation. It dealt with the spruce division, the failure of the aircraft program, condemned the cost-plus system, and named guilty officials. The Democratic Members defended the waste of the spruce program, defended the cost-plus sysem, alluded to the persons criticised as "men who faithfully served the Government during the war" and "men who self-sacrificingly devoted themselves to the cause of their country." As to Colonel Deeds, of whom Mr. Hughes, in his report, had said he ought to be indicted and punished, the report was alleged to be "unwarranted and a gratuitous reflection."

On April 10, 1920, a report was made on war camps. Hundreds of cases of frauds were cited and the cost-plus system condemned. It recommended suits for recovery of sums fraudulently paid out. The Democratic Members said: "The cost-plus system was not only justifiable but inevitable and unavoidable." All war camp contractors were defended and absolved.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I have but a limited time.

On May 18, 1920, a report was filed on nitrate plants, especially Muscle Shoals. The report called attention to the political location of these plants, cited immense frauds in their construction, asked that no further funds be expended until some policy was adopted, and criticized and attacked the legality and fairness of the contracts with the Air Nitrates Corporation and the Alabama Power Co. The Democratic Members defended everything; they defended the expenditure of vast sums after the armistice. They said the contract with the Air Nitrates Corporation was not "unjust and unfair" and that the officer who made it was a "faithful officer of the Regular Army, denied the opportunity—dear to every soldier's heart—of serving with the colors on the battle field." They said about the contract with the Alabama Power Co. which now has been held to be invalid in part:

We think the authorities were justified in turning to the Alabama Power Co. and making the best terms possible, which we believe they did.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; my time is limited and I will not yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is very well that the gentleman refuses to yield on the statement that he is making now.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am quoting the exact language from the official report.

I most respectfully suggest that these minority views be not used by my Democratic friends as campaign documents in the southern country just now.

On February 8, 1921, the committee filed a report on surplus leather goods and condemned the contract with the United States Harness Co., a contract which has since been canceled for fraud and where indictments shall probably soon be returned. The Democratic report said that they did not think the principals in this infamous contract "have in any respect injured the Government or violated the ethics of good citizenship. Their conduct throughout all the different activities in which they have been engaged has been such as to cause the minority to believe them entitled to entire confidence and respect."

On February 28, 1921, a report was presented on various war contracts, among others mentioned and criticized being that of the sale of lumber to J. L. Philips and John Stephens. This is the same matter in which an arrest has just been made of one of the principals. The Democratic report said that they "must express their strong and earnest dissent from practically all of the conclusions which have been reached and the criticisms made by the majority."

On March 2, 1921, a report was filed calling attention to the sale, by certain packers, of large quantities of rotten and poisonous salmon for food for our soldiers, and recommended prosecutions and civil suits. The Democratic Members disagreed with the majority and praised in the most extravagant terms the War Department for not having permitted the soldiers to eat the rotten fish. That is one of the matters Mr. Reavis has in hand now, and I believe before he finishes we shall find there is a God in Israel. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Many more cases might be cited, but they are all the same. That is the record, and it will stand for all time. A record of defense of every war crook who stole from and plundered his country while men died for it with weapons in their hands. That record I submit to the candid and thoughtful consideration of this House and of the country.

It is therefore obvious that our Democratic associates here are now clamoring for an investigation of frauds and criminals which for two years they have said did not exist. Any reasonable man knows that the only effect a congressional investigation will have now will be to embarrass and impede the Attorney General in the prosecutions he now has under way. Anyone who advocates such a proceeding now is, intentionally or unintentionally, only playing into the hands of those who are to be investigated or prosecuted.

It is also apparent that the effect of Democratic policy as to war profiteers and grafters has been:

First. To permit them to practice their frauds unchecked and unimpeded during the war.

Second. To defend them when investigated and accused.

Third. To aid and assist them by interfering with and attempting to create public sentiment against the officials charged by law with their prosecution.

Very few people appreciate the nature of the task the Department of Justice has in these cases. In the first place, every crime committed prior to March 4, 1918, was barred by the statute of limitations when President Harding took his office. This outlawing of crime was permitted by Attorney General Palmer. Before Congress passed the necessary act extending the statute of limitations prosecutions for all crimes occurring before November 18, 1918, were barred. So it will be seen that no crimes committed before the armistice can now be prosecuted. Again, in almost every case of suspected settlements of war contracts, every effort was made by the agents of the last administration to effect a binding and complete settlement so that there could be no further proceeding. The most binding releases have been given, and boards of officers with full authority have done all they can to estop the Government from further proceedings. Men who made the contracts or settlements in question are out of the departments and scattered to the four winds of heaven. In many cases the files are scattered and sometimes lost. Audits in most cases are not available. In thousands of cases there are no contracts at all. Among the officers now in the War Department who had to do with these matters during the war period there is indifference, if not positive hostility to these proceedings by the Department of Justice. The Attorney General has had to build his organization from the ground up. In addition to the many other burdens imposed on the Department of Justice there was a vast additional task of thousands of law and criminal cases arising out of the national prohibition law and the business of the Alien Property Custodian. Out of this mass of chaotic, misplaced, and fragmentary information he must build his cases which will stand the test of the courts. Hearsay and rumor will not do in this forum, but there must be stern, unyielding, verified facts. These facts he is getting, and I think I may safely say that the Attorney General will not be stampeded into precipitate action by unjust and ill-timed criticism, but will prepare his cases before he proceeds. I have entire confidence in the belief that every war criminal who can be prosecuted will receive the vigorous and unrelenting attention of the Department of Justice. To that end let us keep our hands off and attend to our own legislative affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield all the time there is remaining to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. This afternoon an attack was made on me by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. Some of the remarks made by him I think ought to be answered. They reflected not only upon Mr. Wheeler, but directly upon me, and it seems to me in view of that fact that I ought to have an opportunity to answer him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I was under a misapprehension when the gentleman first made his request, and I objected. I shall not object if the gentleman will say that he will confine his remarks to a reply to the attack made on him this afternoon. I do not think he ought to be allowed to go into the general subject of prohibition at length.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. VOIGT. I reserve the right to object until I hear from the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I answered the gentleman that I intended to answer the speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make just a brief statement in answer to the speech made this afternoon by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. So far as this House is concerned, an answer is superfluous. The gentleman has spoken so often in opposition to prohibition that no one takes him very seriously. He has mulled over the great evil that he claims Mr. Wheeler, the Anti-Saloon League, and I have done until he dreams and dreams about it both while asleep and awake. He sees the grand structure of constitutional government reel like one overfull of the liquid refreshment the loss of which he so greatly and constantly bemoans. To him the destruction of the saloon has created an awful void, into which as a bottomless pit all that he considers worth while is being swallowed up.

He appears to be greatly disturbed over the baneful influence that he pretends to think the Anti-Saloon League must have had upon me. He insinuated—and, if I did not mistake his utterances, directly charged—that it would be illegal and corrupt for Mr. Wheeler to make any suggestion to me as to what kind of legislation ought to be passed in the interest of prohibition, and that I was corruptly influenced by such suggestions because the league which Mr. Wheeler represents supported me in the last election and might do so again.

This false and cowardly attack can earn no one anything but contempt. No one that has any regard for what is fair and decent would make it. Mr. TINKHAM has never had any reason to believe that my interest in the cause of prohibition was less sincere than that of Mr. Wheeler, or that it would be anything less than idiotic to talk about corruptly influencing me to support the cause of prohibition.

I might ask, in answer, whose influence is it that speaks through the gentleman from Massachusetts in making this attack? I might with as much show of reason charge Mr. TINKHAM with being corruptly influenced by distillers, brewers, bootleggers, and organizations opposed to prohibition, but I am not going to demean myself by insisting that he has to be bought or otherwise corruptly influenced to vote against prohibition. I grant you that it is not necessary to promise him any support in his campaign to induce him to enthusiastically shout for booze. Still, he will have that support, because they know he will remain faithful to their cause.

I do not expect that kind of support. I would much rather have the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Salvation Army, the churches, and that host of earnest and unselfish men and women whose devotion to the prohibition cause has made possible a saloonless Nation. I am proud of the class of support that I have been able to command, and I have no hesitation in comparing it with the class of people belonging to organizations against prohibition whose votes I presume he is courting.

The reason why this attack is made at this time is apparent. Wet organizations are at work to-day in my congressional district, and have been for months. They have made all sorts of threats of what they are going to do to me. I have had to face all sorts of abuse, and I expect to face a great deal more of it. I am willing to meet all fair criticism, but when a person falsely impugns my motives I resent it, and I intend to resent it as vigorously as I can. I did not believe that the gentleman from Massachusetts would stoop to the methods he is employing.

The efforts to discredit the Anti-Saloon League by charging that it has violated the corrupt practices act because the national organization has not filed statements of what each State organization has received and spent in campaigns is so ridiculous that I admire the gentleman for having the nerve to make it with a straight face. No national or State organization is required under the law to file any such statement. The receipts and expenditures of the State organizations are not reported by the Republican, the Democratic, or any other party. There are hundreds of these organizations, none of which file such reports.

It takes a good deal of gall for a person opposed to prohibition to even suggest that this failure is an offense when not one of the dozens of organizations opposed to prohibition has even filed one. But it is perhaps the thing that may be expected from one who has so little regard for what is fair and decent as the gentleman from Massachusetts has shown in this case.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Are you not going to read the bill? I would like to answer some things that have been stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I agreed to quit when we got through with the general debate. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12090 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. WYANT, for two days, on account of official business.

Mr. PATTERSON of Missouri, for two weeks, on account of serious sickness of his father.

Mr. OVERSTREET, for one week, on account of sickness in family.

Mr. JONES of Texas (at the request of Mr. LANHAM), for to-day, on account of important business.

Mr. COLTON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. TUCKER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 213. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis Mr. John Paul de Baat Doelman, a subject of the Netherlands; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposal of articles produced by patients in the United States Veterans' Bureau.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2682. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto;

S. 426. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled 'An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court,' and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. p. 866);

S. 3156. An act to amend section 70 of the Judicial Code; and

S. 494. An act for the relief of Benjamin O. Kerlee.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill H. R. 10871, making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, for printing under the rules.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday Representative WOODRUFF, of Michigan, made an attack upon the Alien Property Custodian, Thomas W. Miller.

Inasmuch as Mr. Miller is a citizen of the State of Delaware, which State I have the honor to represent, it is not so much a duty as a pleasure for me to make some reply to the attack made upon him. I am in accord with what I think is the purpose of Mr. WOODRUFF in the prosecution of the perpetrators of frauds against the Government during the war. I do not think, however, that it is fair or commendable to attempt by innuendo, implication, covert insinuation, or misleading allusion to asperse the character of a high public official in an indirect way and without the most positive proof. Too often the immunity of a Congressman leads to gross defamation of personal character which the perpetrator would not be willing to make in private life, where he could be held responsible for the loss sustained thereby.

Col. Thomas W. Miller is a young man standing within the threshold of a promising life. He has been a Member of this body; he was in actual service in Europe during the late war; he was in charge of the eastern division of the Speaker's bureau of the Republican Party during the last campaign; he is strong and forceful and possesses great executive ability which those who know him best appreciate the most. It is not possible that such a man would mar the prospects of an exceedingly promising career by deliberate maladministration of his office. It is impossible to understand the animus of the gentleman from Michigan, seeing that by no rule of justice could Col. Thomas W. Miller, the Alien Property Custodian, be held responsible for the acts of his predecessor, or for the prosecution of any fraud which his predecessor may have committed, such prosecution being clearly and solely within the sphere of authority of the Department of Justice. Moreover, no delay or disinclination on the part of the Department of Justice—assuming that such exists—can in fairness be laid at the door of the Alien Property Custodian. The duties of his office are purely administrative and defined by the law which imposes no duty upon him of usurping the functions of the Department of Justice. The immunity of a Congressman is a rare power and should be used with the utmost carefulness. It was granted for the public good; it should not be used against the public good and for the destruction of individual character and reputation. Inasmuch as the charges of the gentleman from Michigan were made from the floor of the House, and will, therefore, appear in the RECORD for public dissemination, I am including in this short address for the purposes of equal publicity certain statements made in answer thereto by the Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Miller, which are as follows:

FAILURE TO TAKE ACTION IN PROSECUTION.

Col. Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, with reference to Congressman WOODRUFF's speech, said to-day:

It was stated that this office has not taken action to reopen and prosecute certain alleged transactions carried on by this office under the previous administration. The entire personnel of this office, which is considerably less in number than before March 4, 1921, is fully engaged in handling current and daily problems that are presented to us in the administration of the 31,000 active trusts now handled by this office. The office is not equipped either with appropriation of money by Congress or in personnel to turn itself into a district attorney's or prosecuting attorney's office. These functions are delegated to the Department of Justice and to Congress, if it so desires, through select or other committees of that body, and we have always complied with any request for information or cooperation from either of these Government agencies in this particular.

If any mistakes have been made by this office under the present incumbent, we will be only too glad to correct such errors should they come to our attention by public notice or as a result of our own investigation.

STATEMENT IN RESPECT TO CHARACTER OF PROPERTY HELD.

Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, in reference to Congressman WOODRUFF's speech, to-day said:

An incomplete and rough estimate of the total amount of property held by this office to-day is criticized in Congressman WOODRUFF's speech, especially the figures which show approximately $29,000,000 belonging to "Americans," and "others" amounting to a like sum. These figures are, of course, an estimate, for the reason that the determination of enemy character is made principally on a decision of residence, and until a claim is filed for the return of property it is absolutely impossible to determine the nationality of the enemy in whose name the property is held. The other nationalities referred to are Czecho-Slovaks, Poles, Yugoslavs, Rumanians, Bulgarians, Turks, and Russians, so many nationalities being involved, due to the partition of the old Austro-Hungarian Empire and the shifting of boundary lines as the result of the war. Property of Americans, neutrals, etc., was taken under the authority of Congress when such persons were resident in enemy territory, or in territory occupied by the enemy.

We are criticized for canceling or "nixing" reports. This is a method of overcoming the customary governmental red tape which should receive approbation of a critic rather than his condemnation. There are thousands of reports of enemy property on the records of this office, which, upon investigation, showed that the property should not be demanded or reduced to possession, and therefore, in order to give the parties interested a clear title, this office, under the present administration, has voluntarily "nixed" hundreds of records on our own initiative and at no expense to the people involved. In fact, we have always returned property whenever claimant comes within the law.

We hold no brief for our predecessors in office and do not know why they placed certain values on property that they had seized, but it is proper to say in reply to Congressman WOODRUFF's criticism that the seeming depreciation in the values of property is due to the depreciation in the market value of the stocks, bonds, and other securities held by this office, which is not estimated on their face value.

ANSWER TO CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH THE SALE OF ALIEN PROPERTY.

Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, replying to Congressman WOODRUFF's speech in the House to-day, said:

No properties have been sold by the present Alien Property Custodian with the exception of small pieces of real estate, and only then when the income from the property was not sufficient to pay taxes and improvements required by municipal authorities, and the assent of the late enemies has been obtained in every instance where it was possible. No lawyers are employed by this administration who on one side represent the custodian and on the other side represent alien interests.

It is not true that the present administration of this office with respect to lawyers' fees, as well as the ethics of the profession, is a scandal under the present administration of this office. In the report of this office to the Senate on April 10 of this year we showed that a total of approximately $117,000 had been paid in lawyers' fees since March 4, 1921, as compared to over $2,000,000 paid under the previous administration. We are operating approximately 33,000 active trusts in this office, scattered from the Philippines to New England, which includes every class of business imaginable, and our actions with regard to these lawyers' fees do not warrant such an accusation. Evidently the Congressman making the charge believes the false figures which have appeared in the public press of late without any foundation of fact. We stand on the report that we made to the Senate on April 10, 1922, covering this question, and we have acted honestly and fearlessly as a trustee for the alien interests in the property administered by this office under the trading with the enemy act.

ANSWER TO CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH THE PEACE RESOLUTION.

Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, with reference to Congressman WOODRUFF's speech, said to-day:

Last June when the peace resolution was pending before the Houses of Congress this office was requested to discuss the then pending resolution with the members of the respective committees in the House and Senate, for the purpose of suggesting certain amendments to the resolution vitally affecting the administration of the trading with the enemy act. A number of amendments were suggested. The ones in which this office was interested were those that would continue the authority of the Alien Property Custodian in following up demands for property not then reduced to possession, but which under the statutes and precedents were in the same category as property that had been surrendered in response to previous demands. If such an amendment had not been inserted, those who had obeyed the provisions of the alien property act by reporting and surrendering enemy property would have been penalized, while those who had disobeyed the law or evaded its provisions by refusing to comply with just and proper demands of the Government would have been immune. It was therefore essential to this office that the language in the peace resolution protect and guarantee compliance with demands served before July 2, 1921, for the surrender of property. The fact remains that we have obtained the amendments that we wanted. The inference drawn with regard to the other amendments, which were not finally incorporated in the peace resolution, is untrue.

ANSWER TO THE MATTER OF THE BOSCH MAGNETO CASE.

Thomas W. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, with reference to Congressman WOODRUFF's speech, said to-day:

Congressman WOODRUFF, in his speech, infers that this office intentionally misrepresented facts in its recent report to Congress concerning the sale of the Bosch Magneto Co. under the Wilson administration.

The only records in the Bosch Magneto case are those that were handed to this office by my predecessor. These official records show that the bill of sale ran to Martin E. Kern, who, according to these records, was purchasing this property for himself and certain other participants. The fact that this office, as a part of the official records of the Bosch Magneto Co., listed the names of these participants, does not mean that we are endeavoring to protect anyone. Surely no one would expect this office to alter official records even though they may be at variance with what may be proven as the result of court or other legal proceedings.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois inform us whether it is his purpose to call up the conference report which he just presented to-morrow or to go ahead with this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the intention is to go ahead with this bill, and when we complete that then to call up the conference report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 23, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

By Mr. CHINDBLOM: A bill (H. R. 12127) for the relief of Donald H. Jeffris; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12128) granting a pension to Mary Mason; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COPLEY: A bill (H. R. 12129) granting a pension to Adaline Harris; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DALE: A bill (H. R. 12130) granting a pension to Harriet A. Bishop; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12131) granting a pension to Addie J. Green; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENISON: A bill (H. R. 12132) for the relief of C. D. Pautler; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 12133) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca J. Dunn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 12134) granting an increase of pension to Charles Von Eiff; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENNEDY: A bill (H. R. 12135) granting an increase of pension to Angie O. Allen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OLDFIELD: A bill (H. R. 12136) granting an increase of pension to Minerva J. Gardner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 23, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Shortridge
Borah	Harreld	Moses	Simmons
Bursum	Harris	Myers	Smith
Calder	Heflin	Nelson	Smoot
Capper	Hitchcock	Newberry	Spencer
Caraway	Johnson	Nicholson	Stanley
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Sterling
Cummins	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Curtis	Ladd	Overman	Underwood
Dial	La Follette	Pepper	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Lodge	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
du Pont	McCormick	Poindexter	Warren
Edge	McCumber	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Ernst	McKellar	Rawson	Watson, Ind.
Fernald	McKinley	Robinson	Willis
Gooding	McLean	Sheppard

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. LADD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are engaged in a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are absent on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 831) to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act, which were on page 1, line 4, after "by," to insert "section 3 of"; on page 1, line 5, after "amended," to insert "to read"; on page 1, to strike out lines 6 to 11, inclusive; and on page 2, line 4, after "association," to insert ", but the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing value and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same shall not be considered as borrowed money within the meaning of this section."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the Senator what the bill is?

Mr. McLEAN. It is a bill which passed the Senate nearly a year ago and has been returned from the House with slight amendments. It merely places the State banks, which may become members of the Federal reserve system, upon the same plane as the national banks with regard to single lines of credit; that is, credit to single individuals. It is recommended by the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do the amendments meet with the approval of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. McLEAN. They do.

Mr. OVERMAN. This has nothing to do with the bill which we passed lately amending the Federal reserve act?

Mr. McLEAN. Nothing whatever. This bill passed the Senate nearly a year ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on June 23, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 154. An act for the relief of Arthur E. Rump;

S. 156. An act for the relief of the heirs of Julio Carrazco, deceased;

S. 426. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled 'An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court,' and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. p. 866);

S. 494. An act for the relief of Benjamin O. Kerlee;

S. 777. An act for the relief of John M. Green;

S. 1087. An act for the relief of H. L. McFarlin;

S. 1730. An act for the relief of Philip S. Everest;

S. 1784. An act for the relief of John B. Elliott;

S. 1880. An act providing for the appointment of Warrant Officer Herbert Warren Hardman as captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army;

S. 2682. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto;

S. 3156. An act to amend section 70 of the Judicial Code; and

S. 3291. An act for the relief of Henry Cordes.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the particular schedule before the Senate at this time is the proposed tariff on chains. This is just as good a place as any to call attention to the preposterous character of some of the proposed tariffs and to kill the bugaboo of future German competition. That bugaboo is held before the American people and before Senators to induce them to approve of great increases in the tariff for the benefit of favored manufacturers. Let me devote a few moments to the matter of chains. Chains constitute a fair sample.

The present tariff on chains is 20 per cent on one class of chains and 25 per cent on another class. It is proposed by the committee to raise those rates to approximately 45 per cent. The first question I ask is, Why?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me just yet.

We might assume naturally that the market was being flooded with foreign-made chains which were destroying an American industry. It has been asserted, particularly by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and others that this is true of German-made chains. It is not true of German-made chains nor of any other foreign-made chains. I challenged the other side to produce any evidence whatever that it is true, and they have utterly failed.

Now, what are the facts? Going back to 1913 we find that the production of American-made chains was approximately $6,000,000 a year, and by such evidence as the Tariff Commission has been able to develop and by such testimony as has been given before the committee it is shown that the present production of chains in the United States approximates $10,000,000. Now, what are the imports of chains? Let us see what evidence there is that chains from other countries are coming into our country in such quantities as to justify nearly doubling the tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to advise him, if he is not already aware of it, that the provision on page 65—> but no chain or chains of any description, except anchor and stud-link chains, shall pay a duty of less than 45 per cent ad valorem—has been disagreed to by the committee, and it was so announced by the chairman of the committee. So the rates the Senator should discuss are the specific rates provided for, and they have been cut, I will say to the Senator, also by the amendment which has been offered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SMOOT. Another thing I wish to say to the Senator is that the specific rates proposed by the pending bill are in many cases less than the rates imposed by the existing law. For instance, take the first bracket in the chain paragraph, and it provides:

> PAR. 329. Chain and chains of all kinds, made of iron or steel, not less than three-fourths of 1 inch in diameter, 1 cent per pound.

One cent has been cut to seven-eighths of a cent, and that amounts to only 12½ per cent instead of 20 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], was on his feet I asked him what was the difference between the tariff on chains, proposed by the committee, and the existing law, and he replied that the proposed tariff approximated the Payne-Aldrich tariff, which was 45 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The Payne-Aldrich tariff contained the provision:

But no chain or chains of any description shall pay a lower rate of duty than 45 per cent ad valorem.

If the Senator from Nebraska will turn to the statistics as to imports and exports, which have been furnished by the department, he will find that after the passage of that law, I think beginning a few months after it went into effect, instead of a specific duty equivalent to 17.41 per cent ad valorem, chains came in under the 45 per cent rate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not ask the Senator to go into details. Suffice it to say that it is proposed to increase the tariff on chains. As the committee reported the bill it provided that the tariff should be 45 per cent, as against the existing tariff of 20 and 25 per cent. If the committee has receded, as it has been forced to recede in a number of other cases because of the fight which Senators on this side of the Chamber have made, I am glad of it, but I still denounce any increase of this rate as an outrage.

What have been the imports? I have stated the amount of production and given figures which must have been before the Committee on Finance. The imports between 1907 and 1913 averaged $45,000 a year; the imports between 1913 and 1919 averaged $89,000 a year; in 1920 they were $113,000; in 1921 they were $40,000. I will give the imports, so far as the figures are available, for 1922. I am now talking about the present year; and I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to that fact. He said I was talking about the past, but I have the figures from the Tariff Commission for the first three months of the present year. What do they show? The imports of chains during the first three months of this year were only $14,759 worth, while we are manufacturing in this country millions of dollars' worth of chains. Practically speaking, no chains are coming into the country; the import of chains is negligible; and yet, just as in other cases, the Committee on Finance take an article in which the American manufacturers are practically controlling the market and they come before the Senate and propose to double the tariff on that article.

The committee have also done the same thing in the case of wood alcohol. They proposed to take wood alcohol, which is now on the free list, off the free list and subject it to a tariff of 10 cents a pound, notwithstanding the fact that Senators on this side of the Chamber showed the fact to be that the United States manufactured one-half of all the wood alcohol in the world and had a great export trade in wood alcohol, exporting it even to Germany. So the Committee on Finance came in here with a proposed tariff on ink of 30 per cent as against the existing tariff of 15 per cent. Senators on this side of the Chamber showed that the American production of ink amounts to $15,000,000 a year, and that the imports are only about $30,000 a year; that they are practically negligible; there is no competition at all; and that, in addition to that, the American ink manufacturers have an export trade amounting to over $2,000,000 a year.

So also the committee came in here in the case of cement and proposed to impose a tariff on cement, although with cement on the free list the United States is the greatest cement manufacturer in the world and manufactures one-half of all the cement made in the world, producing 88,000,000 barrels a year and having practically a monopoly of the market.

So also the Committee on Finance has come here with a tariff upon other articles. Take wire, for instance. I have before me figures as to insulated wire. The Committee on Finance proposed a tariff on insulated wire of 30 per cent, but were compelled to recede to a tariff of 25 per cent, although under the existing law, providing a duty of only 15 per cent, there are practically no imports of that article, the imports amounting to less than $40,000 a year, whereas the manufacture of that wire in this country amounts to $69,000,000 a year and although the United States has an export trade in insulated wire running up into millions of dollars a year. Yet the committee propose a great increase in the tariff on insulated wire. Many other schedules have been raised under similar facts.

Now we come to chains, and the committee propose to do the same thing. They propose a great increase in the tariff on chains, although I have just read the figures which prove that the United States practically manufactures all the chains that are consumed in the United States, and that the imports, even under the present tariff, are negligible.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Nebraska will find that the rate as recommended by the committee on the cheaper chains is less than the 20 per cent rate of the present Underwood-Simmons law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is that rate?

Mr. McLEAN. The rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will take that figure. Let me show the Senator how excessive that is. What is the cost of manufacturing these chains? The total labor cost of manufacturing chains in the United States is only 27 per cent; and yet the Committee on Finance propose, according to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut, to impose a tariff of 20 per cent on the cheaper chains. Why impose a tariff of 20 per cent? Is it to compensate for the difference in the cost of labor, when the whole cost of labor in the manufacture of chains, as shown by the census report, is only 27 per cent?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know where the Senator gets his figures as to the percentage of labor cost.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I get them from the statistics furnished by the Bureau of Census of the United States on all manufactures for 1919.

Mr. McLEAN. On the cheaper chains we have reduced the rate to seven-eighths of a cent a pound, and if the labor cost is not more than 27 per cent, the Senator will find that that rate will no more than equal the difference in the price of the cheaper chains, which runs from 4 to 5 cents a pound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator might as well abandon that argument. If he is right in his assumption, chains would be coming into this country in great quantities and would have been coming in for a long time; but the imports of chains of all kinds for the first three months of this year have only amounted to $14,000, and the manufacture of chains amounted to millions of dollars. So the Senator must be wrong.

Mr. McLEAN. I am not wrong, because, as I will undertake to show, when the Senator concludes his argument, chains are coming in now. I shall submit to the Senate statements, which I think are reliable, showing very recent importations at prices which are so low that the rate which we recommend does not begin to cover the difference in the production costs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a statement from the Tariff Commission, made a few days ago, giving the very latest figures as to the importations of chains. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and others, when I brought this matter up recently, declared that in the past it may have been true that Germany could not export chains to the United States, and did not do it; but he declared that at the present time Germany was doing it. I have here figures which relate to trade during January, February, and March; they are the latest figures which can be procured, and they show that the total quantity of chains imported into the United States during the first quarter of the present year amounted to only 190,198 pounds, and that the value of those chains was $14,759. Those figures might as well all be ciphers, so far as competition with the American chain manufacturers is concerned.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, doubtless the Senator will do so, but he has not as yet given the figures as to the export of chains from this country. If he will turn to the Summary of Tariff Information furnished by the Tariff Commission he will find that the export of chains from this country runs into the millions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can give the figures; I have them before me, and they show that in 1918 we exported $1,940,000 worth of chains; in 1914 we exported $3,318,000 worth of chains; in 1920 we exported $2,335,000 worth of chains; in other words, we are selling chains in competition with every nation in the world in the markets of the world.

Mr. McLEAN. How large were the exports in 1921?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not the figures for 1921 before me. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina has them.

Mr. McLEAN. They have fallen off.

Mr. SMITH. For the nine months of 1921 they were $1,950,797.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In nine months of 1921 they were almost as much as they were for the entire year 1920.

Mr. McLEAN. My understanding is that they have almost entirely fallen off since January 1 of the present year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator always has information somewhere in the air. I challenge him to produce it. I am giving official figures.

Mr. McLEAN. I am waiting for an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am meeting the Senator's argument here that we are in danger of an inundation of cheaply made goods from Germany.

Mr. President, this whole bill is made upon the theory of entering upon a commercial war with Germany, of shutting out

German imports. We have heard here repeatedly from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that this country was in danger of having its industries ruined by German imports, made by cheap German labor; and this bill is aimed directly at Germany. It is an attempt to shut out German imports from this country. Germany is our second largest customer in the world, she is buying from us four times as much as we are buying from her at the present time; and this bill is aimed to shut out those German imports.

Mr. President, I want to divide my subject into two parts. First, I want to show that we are not now having any disastrous German competition; and, secondly, that we are not likely to have any in the future.

Now, as to the present. The fact is that at the present time Germany is buying from us four times as much as we are selling to Germany. The fact is at the present time that our imports from Germany amount to $77,000,000 a year, and that our exports to Germany amount to over $350,000,000 a year. The fact is that we are importing from Germany at the present time less than half of what we imported from Germany before the war. The fact is that before the war one-seventh of all our exports went to Germany and we imported from Germany one-ninth of all our imports. That was a prosperous trade both for Germany and the United States, and it ought to be restored. This bill is an effort to make restoration impossible.

Since the war, however, while our exports to Germany have grown rapidly, until they now amount to over $350,000,000 a year, our imports from Germany amount to only $77,000,000 a year. That is pretty good evidence that there does not exist at the present time any disastrous or extraordinary importation of German goods.

That is not all. What is the German situation? The fact is that after the German Government has strained every nerve to stimulate her exports during the four years that have succeeded the war she has only succeeded in getting them to a point where her total exports are only one-third of what they were before the war. This bugaboo of German production destroying the industries of all other nations is utterly fallacious. The figures do not bear it out.

Before the war Germany exported an average of 6,000,000 tons a month. Now Germany exports an average of 2,000,000 tons a month. In other words, her exports to all the world are only a third of what they were before the war, and notwithstanding Germany's great desire to buy our goods, and her great need for our raw materials, after all the stimulation that she has been able to give her export trade she has only been able to sell to the United States one-half of what she sold us before the war. This is pretty good evidence that there is not any danger of injury coming to this country from German imports.

Now, I want to take up this bugaboo. I want to discuss the future. Certainly no one can claim that the present imports from Germany are injuring us when they are only half of what they were before the war. Certainly no one can claim that Germany is likely to overwhelm the world with her exports when she has only been able to get her exports to one-third of what they were before the war. What, then, of the future?

We are told here in a vague way that in the future we are going to suffer enormously. Senators have to admit that there are no present figures to show great German imports, but they say that the cost of labor is so cheap, that wages in Germany are so low, that the cost of production is so reduced by reason of the fall of the mark, that we will be in danger of it in the future.

Anybody making that assertion makes it without any understanding of what is going on in Germany to-day. The fact is that the German Government has practically bankrupted itself in paying subsidies to keep down the cost of production and to keep down the cost of living for labor. Now the Government has reached a point where it has to withdraw those subsidies, and where wages in Germany are bound to rise. Germany has already begun to withdraw those subsidies. German wages are already rising, as the official reports of the United States show, and the cost of production is steadily increasing.

Let me now take up the matter of German wages.

I have here, from the Frankfurter Zeitung, a table based on the index cost of articles, or, as they express it, the indexzahlen, making a comparative showing of wages in Germany between 1914, or before the war, and 1921. It relates to a number of different trades; and I call this particularly to the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who seems to labor under the delusion that German wages are likely to remain low.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, on the contrary, I stated very distinctly two or three times yesterday that wages were rising and that there were changes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to hear that. I did not happen to catch that remark.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, yes; and that there were changes.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, they are not as high as they were a year ago.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator admits that wages are rising in Germany and falling in the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, yes; I stated that, and that on account of those conditions, which were shifting from time to time, we were making changes to meet the new conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that reduces the danger of this terrible competition from Germany that Republicans fear.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; but wages in Germany are not as high as they were a year ago.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, yes, they are. I have the figures to show it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; that is where the Senator is mistaken, according to my figures. Wages in the United States are somewhat lower, on the whole, than they were a year ago.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hold in my hand an official publication in the United States, the Commerce Reports, by the Department of Commerce, giving the internal value of the German mark, written by Mr. C. E. Herring, commercial attaché at our embassy in Berlin, so that I think the Senator will be required to accept as dependable these United States official figures, quoting German figures:

In 1914, wages in the building trades in Germany averaged 65 pfennigs per hour. In July, 1921, nearly a year ago, they were 700 pfennigs an hour—that is, they had multiplied ten times.

In the chemical industry in 1914 they were 48 pfennigs per hour. In 1921, in July, they were 640 pfennigs an hour, an increase of more than ten times.

In the foodstuffs industry they were 44 pfennigs an hour in 1914, and 708 pfennigs an hour in July, 1921, which is, of course, much more than ten times.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What was the value of 708 pfennigs, measured in gold?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am talking about the increase in the currency payment to the German laborer. I will come to the other matter later, if the Senator will permit me to take one thing at a time. I am showing that in German money German wages have enormously increased and are still increasing.

In the metal industry German wages were 62 pfennigs an hour in 1914, and in July, 1921, they were 660 pfennigs an hour, or ten times as much.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, those figures show nothing whatever in regard to the rate of wages. One is the gold pfennig, and the Senator is giving the paper mark.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that. I do not need a statesman from Massachusetts to tell me that. Of course they are.

Mr. LODGE. Then, why is the Senator reading them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am reading them to show, if the Senator will do me the honor to listen——

Mr. LODGE. I was listening.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That the wages of the German laborer, instead of being at the rate that they were before the war, had increased ten times by last July, and by December, 1921, they had increased to twenty times, and by May of this year they had increased to twenty-eight times what they were before the war.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I supposed the Senator was showing; and he is comparing a mark worth 24 cents with a mark worth one-half of 1 cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will get to the other soon enough, if the Senator will listen. I know what he means, and I have the figures here on that proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I know; but the Senator now says that wages have increased ten times or twenty times. We can not tell how much they have increased until we get a common standard, which the Senator is not quoting.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will give me time, I will come to that proposition. What I am saying is that the German producer has been compelled to concede one increase in wages after another, almost a monthly increase, so that in July, 1921, the German laborer in these skilled trades received ten times as much as he did before the war in German marks, and by December of last year he received twenty times as much as he did before the war, and by the 1st of June of this year he received twenty-eight times as much as he did before the war.

What the Senator from Massachusetts is trying to get at is that the multiplication of German wages twenty-eight times did not equal the fall of the mark, which came down from 24 cents to one-third of a cent. I know that, and I propose to meet that. If the wages of German labor had gone up in proportion to the fall of the German mark, instead of going up twenty-eight times they would have gone up sixty times. I will admit that proposition, but I am coming to that.

German wages are still advancing. Every strike in Germany has been to advance wages, just as every strike in this country is to prevent a reduction in wages at the present time. Wages in Germany are steadily rising, almost month by month, and while they have not kept pace with the fall of the German mark the German mark has ceased to fall and wages are still rising, so that in the future German labor is going to cost the manufacturer much more than it has cost him in the past. That is my proposition, and I challenge anybody to deny it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I want to deny it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will say to the Senator that his statement as to 65 pfennigs being the wage in 1914 is correct. That amounted to 16 cents at that time on the gold basis. The Senator's statement is correct that in July, 1921, German labor received 700 pfennigs. Seven hundred pfennigs is the equivalent of 7 marks, which meant 11 cents at that time. The last figure the Tariff Commission had on this question for June, 1922, the present month, was 28 to 30 marks, which is equivalent to 10 cents American money; so that the statement I made that the wages were less than a year ago is correct if these figures furnished me by the Tariff Commission are correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I quote here the following official figures published in the Frankfurter Zeitung and adopted by our representative in Berlin as authoritative:

TABLE II.—Comparative wages in several industries in the Frankfurt district in 1914 and July, 1921.

Industries.	Wages in 1914.	Actual wages in July, 1921.
	Pfennigs per hour.	Pfennigs per hour.
Building	65	700
Chemical	48	640
Foodstuffs	44	708
Metal	62	660
Rubber	50	640
Shoe and leather	63	600
Soap	45	630
Woodworking	63	675

Those figures prove that German wages in German money were over ten times as great in July last year as before the war.

During the next six months they continued to rise, and by the end of last year, as shown by official reports, they were as follows:

TABLE III.—Comparative wages in several industries in the Frankfurter district in July and December, 1921.

Industries.	Wages in July, 1921.	Actual wages in December, 1921.
	Pfennigs per hour.	Pfennigs per hour.
Building	700	1,300
Chemical	640	935
Foodstuffs	708	1,188
Metal	660	1,180
Rubber	640	935
Shoe and leather	600	900
Soap	630	940
Woodworking	675	1,085

On an average at the end of 1921 therefore they were nearly 20 times greater than before the war. They had nearly doubled in six months. I am not able to get official figures at this date, but a cablegram from Berlin, published in the papers early this month, showed that the wages of labor had in six months further advanced until they are 28 times what they were before the war.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator ought to call our attention to Russia and Austria.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline to yield for an interruption of that sort.

Mr. McLEAN. According to the Senator's theory, the Russians are the highest-paid workmen in the world at this time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that, as paid in German marks, the producers are compelled to pay 28 times as many marks every month to their labor as they paid before the war.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that that increase of 28 times does not equal the decline in the value of the mark. That is true.

Yet, in spite of that fact, German imports have not come into this country. German labor has been nominally cheaper than American labor, but the imports have not come in, and what is going to happen from now on? From now on those wages are going up, while the mark remains stationary. The German mark can not fall to any great extent without creating a cataclysm which will ruin Germany and make it impossible for her to compete with anybody.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What the Senator had to say about importing chains from Germany is quite correct, but the Senator must remember that Germany has not been exporting chains to the United States and has rather contented herself with trying to capture and occupy South American markets, and our market for chains in South American countries has practically gone. German exports have gone to South America, and to-day Germany has possession of the South American market in chains.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a beautiful fiction to introduce at this time. I have already shown the Senator that German exports are only a third at this time of what they were before the war.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Nevertheless, they are far underselling us in any chains we are sending down there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know anything about that. I know that we sell to South America a great deal more than we buy from South America.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not of chains. I am talking about chains.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am talking about imports. The Senator yesterday was talking about all kinds of imports, and I am charging that this bill is aimed directly against Germany on the foolish idea that we are in danger of disastrous competition from Germany, and I have shown that German imports to us are only half what they were before the war, and I have shown that German exports to all the world are only a third what they were before the war. I have shown that German wages are steadily on the rise, while American wages are being cut down.

I want to show the Senator another thing. Germany has been spending billions of marks a year giving subsidies to manufacturers and to labor. Germany has been doing that with the idea of promoting her export trade.

Now, Germany has to stop that, because the paying of those enormous subsidies is bankrupting the Government, and Germany has already begun the work of retracing her steps and is withdrawing those subsidies. By purchasing wheat and selling it at a loss Germany has been paying a bread subsidy equal to 50 per cent of the consumption of bread by the industrial classes, in order to cheapen their cost of living and keep them content with wages, but in February Germany was forced to reduce that subsidy one-half.

Germany has been paying a subsidy amounting to thousands of millions of marks a year to her railroads to carry freight cheap for the manufacturers to the ports of export. The deficit on the German railroads has amounted to 36,000,000,000 marks a year, but in December of last year Germany began the work of abandoning that subsidy. Germany increased her freight rates 50 per cent in December, and on top of that she increased them 33 per cent more in February of this year. In December Germany increased her passenger fares 30 per cent, and in February she increased them 75 per cent. That means that Germany is abandoning the subsidy which she has been giving to the railroads to carry freight below cost for the benefit of the producers so as to enable the producers to compete with us.

Not only that, but in order to keep labor satisfied and enable producers to get their labor at a low price, Germany enacted a law that rents should not be increased over pre-war figures except as the various municipalities should consent, and no municipality in Germany has permitted an increase of rents of more than 100 per cent. In other words, instead of rents being raised to thirty times what they formerly were to correspond to the purchasing power of the depreciated currency, they have not even been doubled. So it happens that the German laborer pays out only 2 per cent of his wages for rent, whereas before the war he paid out 20 per cent of his wages for rent. These are official figures I am quoting. They are in the American commerce reports, sent over by our commercial representatives, and they are authoritative.

In doing that thing Germany has been compelling the property owners, the landlords of the cities, who rent to the laborers, to bankrupt themselves in order that German wages can be kept down and German manufacture can be promoted. But that has to be abandoned. Many landlords are in the poorhouses to-day in Germany or are being supported by public charity. The buildings are falling into decay, because no landlord can live on rents which amount to less than one-tenth what they were before the war. That has to be abandoned. Rents must soon rise in Germany, and as they rise there will be another increase of wages to meet the increase in rents.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator deny that every mill in Germany is running, that everybody is at work, and that that fine organization of which the German people are capable, probably more than any other people in the world, is being worked right at this time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny that emphatically. I have the figures showing that the productiveness of Germany to-day is only about 60 per cent of what it was before the war, and those are figures from the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What branch of industry is idle in Germany?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not state what branch is idle, but Germany unfortunately has not been able to get her raw materials to keep her factories running at capacity, and labor has insisted on reducing the hours of labor from 8½ to 8 hours. Labor has insisted that the employers shall pay for annual leave, which they never did before. Labor in Germany has insisted that employers shall pay for extra sick allowances, which they never did before, and one demand after another that has been made upon the German producers finds them in a sort of a strait-jacket, with constantly rising wages and cost of production. Now, on top of that comes a withdrawal of the subsidies which the German Government has been paying. So that I say that for the future German competition, instead of increasing, is going to decrease, and Germany is confronted, as the result of abandoning these subsidies, with one of the most terrible possibilities that can be foreseen.

All people in Germany are worried about what is going to happen this fall. There is a constant increase in the cost of living in Germany. There is a constant increase in the rate of wages to German labor and a steady increase in the cost of production. To make matters worse, taxes must be increased, forced loans must be levied, and subsidies must be withdrawn to get rid of deficits in the Government budget. Among other subsidies the Government must withdraw are the subsidies paid to the cities and industrial centers called municipal subsidy.

I almost forgot to mention that latter subsidy. That is another great subsidy which the German Government has been paying to keep labor content with the wages of the past. The German Government enacted a law that a municipality should not permit an increase in the price of gas, electricity, street car fare, water, and all of the other supplies to the people of those cities beyond a certain point, and the result of that act on the part of the German Government was that the municipalities have demanded and received from the German Government enormous sums of money to make good their losses.

The act of the German Government in keeping down the price of gas, keeping down the price of electricity, keeping down the price of street car fare, keeping down the price of water, to where they had been substantially before the war, has kept the cost of living low, and it has kept the German laborer quiet. But see what a penalty the German Government has had to pay for doing that thing.

The deficit of the free city of Hamburg, for instance, for the present year is estimated at 400,000,000 marks. The German Government contributes 330,000,000 of that 400,000,000 marks.

The free city of Bremen is to receive 100,000,000 marks from the German Government. The city of Berlin has a deficit of 340,000,000 marks, which has to come out of the German Govment, and there are many others.

So these municipal budgets run enormous deficits, which the German Government has had to pay in order to keep the cost of living low to the German people; and now the time has come when, under the demand of the allied governments, Germany has to balance her budget, and she is compelled to withdraw those subsidies to the various municipalities for keeping the cost of living low. The cost of living is rising, and the wages of labor are rising in consequence of that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator let me ask him a question? I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall be delighted.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. While the figures are not fresh in my mind, my recollection is that before the Great War Germany constantly had an adverse trade balance, but that within the last little while her trade balance turned the other way, and she now has a favorable trade balance for the first time in a very great many years, and her exports are exceeding her imports. In this connection, is it not a fact that these things, internal and domestic, which the Senator mentions are not the great burden on the back of Germany to-day, but that the reparation she is compelled to pay is the great burden, and is she not paying the reparation she is compelled to pay by means of exporting goods?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I looked into that matter, and I give the Senator some figures. It is true that before the war there was always a slight balance of trade against Germany, which Germany was able to meet because she had foreign investments, because she had a great merchant marine, so that her business was prosperous. As I have said, Germany imported from us during pre-war days something like three hundred and fifty or three hundred and sixty million dollars' worth of goods a year and exported to us only about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty million dollars' worth of goods a year. Germany at that time could exist with an adverse trade balance. Now, however, Germany's whole life depends on securing an excess of exports over imports. She can not hope to pay any of her reparations unless she can by some means stimulate her exports so that they will exceed her imports. Germany has to pay her debts in gold, and there are in Germany at this time only about a billion gold marks. She has no gold mines, she has no colonies, and if she pays her reparations in gold she can only do it by stimulating her exports so that they will exceed her imports. It is for that reason that Germany has strained every nerve to get her exports up to a point where there will be a margin with which she can buy the gold exchange to pay her reparation, and she has not been able to do it. The Senator knows the fact to be that the demand made upon Germany on the 1st of May of last year required her to raise about 3,000,000,000 gold marks a year, and by a gigantic effort she only succeeded by September in raising a billion gold marks, one-third, and since that time she has been utterly unable to pay the remaining amount, in proportion, and she is now paying only 50,000,000 gold marks a month, and to do that she is straining every nerve.

Now, then, let us see about the German trade. I think it is better, perhaps, to name this in tons than in marks, on account of the difficulty in the value of money. In the year 1921, in the month of July, Germany's imports were 1,925,000 tons. I hope the Senator from Indiana will listen to these figures.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Her exports were 1,558,000 tons. The exports were less than the imports. In August her imports were more than her exports. In September her imports were more than her exports. In the next month, October, imports were more than her exports, and so on down to December, 1921, when they were almost balanced, but the imports were a little more than the exports. When we come to the first three months of this year, which are the only months available so far as this year's statistics are concerned, in January the imports were 2,309,000 tons and the exports were only 2,000,000 tons. In February the imports were 1,475,000 tons and the exports 1,700,000 tons. There was a slight margin in her favor. In March the imports were 2,600,000 tons and the exports were 2,153,000 tons, a balance against Germany.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator is giving the tonnage?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Has he converted it into value?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will see if I have it here.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I think in perhaps a few of those months there would be a difference shown in value compared with tonnage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can give it in millions of marks for the three months of this year. The imports in January were 12,000,000 marks and the exports were 14,000,000 marks. In February the imports were 12,000,000 marks and the exports 14,000,000 marks. In March the imports were practically 23,000,000 marks and the exports only 21,000,000 marks. That makes at best an even balance for Germany. There is not any considerable balance in her favor. As far as the United States is concerned, we are exporting to Germany four times as much as Germany is sending to us, and those are the figures in which we are interested. They certainly do not show that we are importing too much from Germany.

I say, in view of these facts, that the talk about German exports threatening this country is a bugaboo. Our wages are falling and Germany's wages are rising month by month, and they have got to continue to rise because Germany has only just entered upon her new policy of withdrawing the subsidies which she has given to the manufacturers and to labor in order to keep the cost of labor down.

German labor is not in such a plight as some people seem to think it is, because while the value of the German mark expressed in gold in foreign commerce has fallen from 20 cents to one-third of 1 cent, the purchasing power of the German mark in Germany for the things the laborer has to buy is twice as much as its exchange value.

I have in my hand a statement showing the domestic purchasing power of the mark as compared with its gold value starting with January, 1920. At that time the mark had an exchange value of only a little over 2 cents in gold, but to the German laborer in Germany its purchasing power was 5 cents, and so on down to the present time. The foreign value of the mark is only one-third of a cent at this time, but to the German laborer, as shown by these official figures, it is two-thirds of a cent. So that heretofore, by the action of the German Government in keeping prices down, in keeping rents down, in keeping freights down, in keeping the prices of food down, in keeping down the prices of all articles the German laborer uses, the German Government has been able to make the German laborer reasonably content. It is true that the exchange value of the mark in foreign trade has fallen from 24 cents to one-third of 1 cent, but its purchasing power in Germany is twice that, while the wages of the German laborer have increased till they are twenty-eight times what they were before the war.

Mr. McLEAN. That is to the advantage of the German producer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have just shown to the Senator that the German Government has abandoned the giving of these subsidies——

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator can speculate on that proposition as long as he wants to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no speculation at all. It is in the official report.

Mr. McLEAN. The value of the German mark in Germany is greater than its exchange value and that is to the advantage of the German producer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But that value in Germany is now changing. Take away the subsidies to the railroad and multiply the fares that the laborer has to pay on the street cars when he goes to work; take away the subsidies from the gas companies and the water companies and the electric-light companies and increase what the laborer has to pay for heat and light; take away the subsidies paid in rents, which are bankrupting the German landlords and which can not be continued, and compel the German laborer to pay ten times the rent he is paying now; and the German laborer will have an absolutely unanswerable argument in favor of an increase in wages. The German laborer rules Germany to-day. The German Government has been compelled to do those things to satisfy the German laborer. The German Government will be compelled, as it has been in the case of almost every strike over there for increased wages, to induce the employers to grant the increase. Every strike in Germany has been for increased wages, just as every strike in the United States is to prevent a reduction in wages. German wages are rising faster than in any other country in the world. They are rising faster than they ever have in history.

Mr. McLEAN. Until the Allies reduce the reparation penalties, can the Senator tell me how Germany can increase wages in gold?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know that the two are interdependent. The German Government is between two fires. The German Government will be overthrown if labor becomes discontented, and there will be a riot of Bolshevism in Germany, and then nobody will have German exports to be afraid of. German labor has to be kept content, and the German Government will have to keep it content. The German Government will continue to say to France, to Great Britain, and to Italy, as it has in the past, "We can not pay your reparations"; and I am here to say that they can not pay them. They can not pay them except they can make their exports exceed their imports, and they can not do that to any great extent.

Mr. McLEAN. Is that the fault of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; not at all; except as this bill proposes to shut out German trade.

Mr. McLEAN. Are we to risk our industrial life because of that fact?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Connecticut knows that the argument I am making is that the figures show we have not had disastrous competition from Germany in the past, although Germany has been paying these enormous subsidies to stimulate exports. Now I am showing on top of that that Germany has to stop paying those subsidies, because she has to make her budget balance. I say if Germany adopts that policy, instead of there being more danger from German competition, there is less danger.

Mr. McLEAN. That is for the Senator to say; but his statement that we are at the present time suffering no inconvenience by reason of German importations I deny.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There may be some certain manufacturers suffering inconvenience, but when German imports into this country are less than one-fourth of what we are selling to Germany, and when German imports into this country are less than one-half of what they were before the war and what they normally should be, certainly there is no danger to this country. All the evidence that has been introduced here by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]—that bird cages and shotguns and hair curlers and electric hair driers and amber chains and other knickknacks have come into the country and have been sold at the level of American prices—completely disproves the argument that our industries are in any danger from the pauper labor of Europe. These statesmen have disproven their own case by all this fantastic display of ridiculous importations. There has not been a single month in which the imports from Germany can be pointed to as being excessive. There has not been a single article as to which the American producer has been injured. It is all guesswork as to the future, and I am trying to show the Senator that in the future Germany is going to be less able to export to us than she has been during the last few years.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator may attempt to show that, but I shall be interested to observe how he is going to do it. He will have to be a good deal of a prophet, and, in my opinion, his prophecy will fail.

But to return to the Senator's statement that the exhibitions which were made yesterday and previously, indicating an enormous spread between the import price and the retail price, show nothing, I would say that if the Senator were a manufacturer in this country he would very soon realize that his market is to the jobber or the retailer, and as long as the large importing houses and wholesalers in this country can purchase German goods for one-fourth what it costs to manufacture those goods in this country, the American manufacturer is in a pocket, because he can not sell his goods and he will not be able to sell his goods as long as the importers can get the foreign goods at a price so much under the cost of production of the American product. He is simply in a pocket. He has no customers and he will not have any customers until we give him protection sufficient to bring the foreign price up to the level of the cost of American production. The Senator must see that. He certainly would if he were a manufacturer and his orders fell off and he inquired as to the cause and was immediately told that his former customers were buying these goods abroad at prices far below his cost of manufacture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if what the Senator is pointing to were dependable, it would be shown in our imports, but I repeat to the Senator that our imports from Germany are only one-fourth of what we sell to Germany. Our imports from Germany are only one-half of what they were during the prosperous years of Woodrow Wilson's administration.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that our exports to Germany are not competitive, of course. They consist largely of foodstuffs and raw materials.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But they are as great as they were before the war while our imports are only one-half.

Mr. McLEAN. I know; but let us look at this matter in as fair a light as possible. The imports into this country are confined to goods a very large percentage of the cost of which is represented by labor, and in that respect Germany has a tremendous advantage. If the Senator were making knives or razors or chains or any other article where the labor costs ran from 50 to 80 per cent, he would soon realize that an importation of 2 per cent only would demoralize his trade and that he would be at the mercy of the price quotations of the foreign goods if they did not exceed 2 per cent, or even 1 per cent, of his manufacture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a very beautiful argument, but the exhibit which has been made by the colleagues of the Senator from Connecticut on the committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], completely disproves what the Senator from Connecticut states. That exhibit which was made here shows that the importers sell the foreign goods at the American prices because the American producers are holding an umbrella over them and they can do so.

Mr. McLEAN. In my previous statement I completely answered that point. So long as the importers can buy a knife in Germany for 10 cents which it costs 30 cents in this country to make, the American manufacturer is in a pocket; he can find no market for his goods, because he can not retail them.

I was somewhat gratified to hear the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on yesterday come to the conclusion that the profiteering was confined to the retailer. I had understood from the declamations to which I had listened from the other side of the Chamber during the past six weeks that the profiteering was confined to the manufacturers in this country and that we were building up this tariff wall in order to enable the manufacturers to establish extortionate prices.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to confine the Senator from Connecticut to the proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say on yesterday and I have not said at any time that the profiteering was confined to retailers, but I did say yesterday that if the importers who are also retailers were profiteering in the retail prices charged by them the American merchant who deals in American products as a retailer is also profiteering, and profiteering to the same extent. I have not said that profiteering was confined altogether to the retailers; I do believe that they are the biggest profiteers, but I am absolutely sure that at this time there is a great deal of profiteering on the part of the manufacturers and wholesalers, as well as on the part of the retailers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut may have his fears that German competition in the goods which he has in mind is going to injure the industries of the United States. If they were injuring them, however, it would be shown in the volume of imports, and I repeat, I do not know for how many times, that the imports do not show it. Imports from Germany at the present time are only half what they were before the World War, and are only a quarter of what we are selling to Germany. They would be larger if the Senator's theory were correct.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Nebraska is quoting totals?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I am quoting totals.

Mr. McLEAN. But I happen to know that in special lines the imports have increased tremendously.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am talking about totals. The pending bill deals with totals.

Mr. McLEAN. No. The bill deals with schedules and items.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There may be some factories in the State of the Senator from Connecticut whose business is depressed. I will tell the Senator one reason why it is depressed. It is because the whole country is depressed. There is an enormous reduction in our consumption over here. We have got nearly a bankrupt South as the result of that section not being able to sell its cotton. We have had the copper mines in the West closed for a year; we have had our agricultural products in the West for two years selling at less than it cost to produce them. We may not expect those people to buy manufactured goods, either American or imported, in any great quantities. The business in the East is depressed, and so is the business in the West; but it is not because of German importations, for German importations, I again repeat, are only half what they were before the World War.

Mr. President, in another publication——

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Nebraska refers to importations coming in under the Underwood Act, I agree with him. They are very serious.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are not. This country never had such an era of prosperity as it had during the eight years of Woodrow Wilson's administration under the Underwood Act. The existing depression only began two years ago, after the Republicans got control of the House and the Senate, and it has been intensified since the Republicans have had control of the whole Government. The Republicans have practically been two years trying to frame a tariff bill; they have been trying to do the ridiculous thing of building an obstruction to international commerce when the country is suffering because of the decline of international commerce. The reason we have the present depression in the United States is practically admitted by every economist. It is because our international commerce has collapsed. We are selling every month to the other nations of the world less than we sold the month before. Our commerce has been going down. Our exports have shrunk from eight billion to five billion dollars, then to $4,000,000,000, and this year they are going to be less than $4,000,000,000. That is what is the trouble with us. Our depression is due to the collapse of our international commerce. It is for that reason that we have three-fourths of our great merchant marine swinging at anchor, idle in our harbors—a merchant marine which cost $4,000,000,000. The Republican administration has a conception of setting our merchant marine to work under subsidies when there is nothing for it to carry. Instead of doing something to impede international commerce, instead of doing something to bar out business from the remainder of the world, this Congress ought to be at work to stimulate it; and yet this bill is directed with its overwhelming purpose to shut out imports from Germany, on the foolish theory that Germany is going to be able to provide a disastrous competition when Germany has reached her limit. Germany is now abandoning the very policy with which she has stimulated her export trade during the last two years, and, as she abandons it, the cost of living, the cost of wages, and the cost of production in Germany are bound to increase. They are increasing at the present time. So I say that, considering past business, there is no warrant for these great increases in tariff duties, and for future business there is certainly no justification for increased rates, because the competition is bound to be less in future years than it has been during the past two years.

If Germany could keep up these subsidies, if she could hold down the price of living, if she could continue her bread subsidies to the laborer, and keep his wages down, if she could continue subsidies to the cities so as to keep down the price of gas and electricity and street car fare and other things, if she could compel the landlords to keep the price of rents down to one-tenth of what they ought to be, Germany might be able to stimulate her export trade; but Germany has got to abandon that policy or go into bankruptcy and have a cataclysm of government. So I say that, so far as the future is concerned, there is not only not much danger from German competition for any of these favored industries which the Republican Party cherishes so dearly, but there is not even as much danger as there has been in the past.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska, in my opinion, is grievously mistaken in his foreshadowing of future events. I do not think he will find an economist of standing anywhere who will agree with him in the statement he has just made. Our trade in competitive articles in the future will grow less and less dependable. The automatic labor-saving machine that is invented in this country is immediately copied by other countries, and the machine that is invented in other countries is immediately copied by us. There is only one way by which we can expect to maintain our foreign commerce in competitive articles, and that is by reducing the labor costs, and that is a proposition to which I do not subscribe. The real question of interest to the laboring man of this country is the purchasing power of his day's work and the Senator knows——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Senator to defer his speech. I am quite willing to yield to questions, of course.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that a day's work in this country to-day will purchase from three to four times what a day's work in other countries will purchase.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if that is true, so be it and God be praised; but I am directing my thought to an attack on this bill because it is framed with the idea of starting a commercial war on Germany, to prevent Germany from selling us her goods, when the very thing we ought to do is to encourage Germany to sell her goods in order that we may sell our products to Germany. Germany has not gold with which to pay; Germany can only pay in products, and we ought not to erect a barrier to German commerce as is proposed by this bill. I am directing my attention now to showing that even from the Senator's standpoint there is no danger of German competition because it is bound to diminish in the future as Germany withdraws her subsidies and German wages rise, as they are rising.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no; I do not admit that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not say the Senator admitted it.

Mr. McLEAN. I thought the Senator did. I said that our commerce in competitive articles will grow less and less dependable in the future, because the competition will be fiercer and the labor cost will be the controlling item.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an official pamphlet entitled "Price Regulation and Production Costs in Germany." I think, Mr. President, I shall ask leave to incorporate in my remarks certain paragraphs from this report instead of reading them at the present time, although I shall read the concluding summary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I read from this report, published by authority of the United States Government. The information comes from Mr. C. E. Herring, American Commercial Attaché in Berlin, so that it can be taken as reasonably authoritative and disinterested:

It seems apparent that the present competitive prices of German manufacturers rest upon a much less secure basis than the costs of their competitors in the United States. The German manufacturer has been directly subsidized, and this condition still exists to a less extent through national and local public utilities deficits borne by the Government and the municipalities and through partly controlled bread prices, all of which the Government has covered by means of new inflation. He is being indirectly subsidized by the entire landlord class, except the agrarians, and this exploitation of one class for the benefit of the nation as a whole is more important than the Government subsidies. Furthermore, the German manufacturer is in a sense indirectly subsidized by the Government in so far as present and future budget deficits may in the end imply heavier additional taxation, which would bear heavily upon industry and would eventually be reflected in a higher level of production costs.

It has been clear from the outset that the cost of living, and consequently wage and production costs, could not be kept down indefinitely by the uneconomic measures of the German Government, justifiable as they may have been during the critical transition period following the armistice. Such expedients, necessitating continuous resort to the printing press, must eventually defeat their purpose, and it seems probable that German economic life is now approaching the saturation point where cost can not longer be reduced by the temporary panacea of inflation and unfunded borrowing. Price levels and wage schedules have continued to rise during the past two months—

I ask the Senator to note that during the past two months, just as they have through all the other months, in spite of the subsidies, prices and wages in Germany have risen—despite the recovery from the extreme mark depreciation of November, and it is likely that this upward tendency will continue as the artificial measures discussed in this report are further modified or abandoned.

Mr. President, that is about all I care to say. I have shown that as far as the pending tariff schedule is concerned the American chain manufacturers control the market and have a great export trade; that there is practically no importation of chains from Germany or from any other place to compete with them. I have shown that the German competition since the armistice was signed up to the present day is negligible, because German imports to the United States are not now more than one-half what they were before the war, and that Germany is incapable of stimulating her exports in the future, as has been shown during the last three years, even by giant subsidies; that in spite of all those subsidies to the producing class, those subsidies to labor, German exports to-day are only a third of what they were before the war. I have shown that the payment of those subsidies has made such enormous deficits in the German budget that Germany has already begun to abandon them, and will be compelled to abandon all of them, and that as these subsidies are abandoned wages inevitably must rise faster than ever, because the cost of living to the German laborer must rise as these artificial subsidies are withdrawn.

So I say that the figures of our imports in the past show that German imports are not even as large as they ought to be, and the production of the future is irresistible that German competition in the future can not even be as effective as it has been in the past, because the cost of producing in Germany must inevitably rise, and is rising at the present day.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, is the Senator in favor of free trade with Germany?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am in favor of reducing the tariff so that we can do a big trade with Germany.

Mr. McLEAN. What tariff rate would the Senator advocate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At present I would leave it as it is, but I believe many of the schedules ought to be reduced. I believe we ought to tear down every brick in the tariff wall that interferes with trade from Europe, so that we can sell our surpluses to Europe. As the Senator well knows, we have in this country half of the gold of the world. We have a great credit against the rest of the world. They can not pay us in cash. If they buy our stuff, they will have to send their products to pay for it, and by erecting this wall against their products we are erecting a wall against our own exports.

Mr. McLEAN. Would the Senator advocate a rate that would equal the difference?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; after it had been shown necessary I would support a rate that would raise revenue and establish competition between German manufacturers and American manufacturers in the American market. I believe in competition; but I will say to the Senator that I do not believe that the production cost in Germany is any cheaper than it is in the United States on many articles of common use.

Mr. McLEAN. I know the Senator has stated that, but if he were in the manufacturing business he would not hold to that opinion very long. Then, as I understand, the Senator would advise tariff rates that would equal the difference in the labor costs here and abroad?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I advise tearing down every schedule of the present tariff that is excessive, and I believe some of them are; and I would favor the rejection of this outrageous bill, which does not pretend to provide more money for the Treasury, but is intended only to exclude trade from other countries, chiefly from Germany, upon a false theory. I am willing to accord to the Senator from Connecticut and others sincerity in the fear of German trade, but I am trying to show him from statistics that that fear can not be based upon imports from Germany in the past, and I am trying to show him by official publications that Germany will be less able to export in the future because of these constantly rising costs of production in Germany. Wages are rising and every cost of living is rising Germany, and wages are falling in the United States. You can not get around those points; and, as these statements by our own commercial attachés show, the inevitable future is that the cost of producing in Germany must rise, and I challenge anybody to show by any economic writer or by any statistics that I am wrong.

Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in my remarks at the proper place certain extracts from the commerce reports on the internal value of the German mark, and certain extracts from price regulation and production costs in Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, because I desire an early vote on this bill, I shall take only a moment or two to reply to that portion of the speech of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] which relates to the schedule under discussion, and that is chains.

I understood the Senator to make one statement which I think is the gist of his whole argument. I understood him to use substantially this language—that we should tear down every brick that interferes with our trade with Europe. That, I think, is the gist of the Senator's argument. He certainly is entitled to that view. I take the contrary view. I do not believe it is wise to adopt legislation that tends toward ultimate free trade, which is the goal of the party represented on the other side of the aisle. I think there ought to be protection for American industry.

As to the particular schedule under consideration, I desire to take time only to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain facts from page 1837 of the hearings relating to the cost of production in England and in this country with reference to the item of chains, and from pages 1838 and 1839 showing the difference in the cost of producing chains in Germany and the United States, and also a telegram which has come to me within the last few minutes, and which I shall read, as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., June 21, 1922.

Senator WILLIS, Washington, D. C.:

To confirm your position on need for protection on machined chains, German bicycle chains are offered in this country, duty and freight paid, at less than 10 cents per foot, which is below our production costs. Their quality is vastly inferior but appearance is good enough to deceive the small buyer on this size chain; 65 per cent of its cost is labor.

GUY A. WAINWRIGHT,
Vice President Diamond Chain & Manufacturing Co.

The Senator from Nebraska said that the labor cost was only 25 per cent. The manufacturer of chains has different information.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the two excerpts that I referred to from the hearings, as well as the telegram which I have just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The English quotations on which chain was purchased by the Emergency Fleet Corporation during 1919 and the comparative manufacturing costs in the plant of the American Chain Co. (Inc.), under practically the same relative conditions of labor and material in the two countries, and using the most improved methods of manufacture which have been developed, were as follows:

Size.	English price at $4.86.	English price at $4.	American factory cost.
1¼-inch	$7.25	$6.12	$8.45 per 100 pounds.
1½-inch	7.02	5.96	$8.01 per 100 pounds.
2-inch	7.72	6.44	$8.92 per 100 pounds.
2½-inch	7.90	6.57	$7.97 per 100 pounds.
2½-inch	8.00	6.66	$8.01 per 100 pounds.

The English quotations given above are f. o. b. English ports. The ocean freight charges on anchor chain have always been and are to-day exceedingly low, the freight from Liverpool to New York at the present time being quoted at approximately 35 cents per hundred pounds, while the carload rate of freight from Columbus, Ohio, to New York is 48 cents per hundred pounds.

Comparison between quoted prices of Boker Cutlery & Hardware Co. and the quoted prices of American Chain (Inc.) then in force.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I did not say that the labor cost was 27 per cent.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator; I am sorry. I understood him to say that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was the census report which showed that. I did not say it. That is not my authority. I am giving an official figure as against the ex parte statements of an interested manufacturer.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not, of course, question the Senator's reading at all; but I venture to say that the manufacturer of this chain has about as much information about the cost of his labor as either the Senator from Nebraska or whoever wrote the report from which he was reading.

That is the difficulty about the Senator's argument. He undertakes to consider this thing as a whole. He refers constantly to the fact that the importations from Germany are not as great as the exportations to Germany. We are talking about the duty on chains; and incidentally I may add that the pending amendment provides for a reduction of that duty, and I hope we may have a vote on it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I feel very much as does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. We have had this schedule under discussion for four days, I believe, and I want to get a vote, and for that reason my reply to the Senator from Nebraska will be very brief.

The Senator from Nebraska represents an agricultural State. He has a soft spot in his heart for Germany, and he has put into the RECORD some very interesting speculations which may or may not come true. If he lived in one of the great manufacturing States of the Union I think his views on this subject would be modified and very extensively modified.

For instance, the State which I have the honor in part to represent has a pay roll of something like $400,000,000 a year in manufactures. We have about 4,800 shops. Our average wage scale is $3.50 a day, or a little more. These figures are taken from the census report of 1919.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what the annual product of the factories of his State amounts to?

Mr. McLEAN. The annual manufactured product of the State of Connecticut is larger than the value of the entire wheat crop of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How large is it?

Mr. McLEAN. In answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska I will say that in 1919 the value of the product of the manufacturing establishments of Connecticut was $1,392,000,000; the cost of the raw material was $685,000,000 and the value added by manufacture $706,000,000. Those figures are the latest I have been able to obtain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the value is approximately $1,400,000,000?

Mr. McLEAN. One billion and three hundred and ninety-two million dollars, which is greater than the value of the entire wheat crop of the United States in 1921.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator another question. What per cent of protection does he think is necessary for the factories in his State?

Mr. McLEAN. I think the protection should equalize the difference in the production costs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator figured out what it ought to be, on an average?

Mr. McLEAN. I have tried to do so, to the best of my ability. That is all I ask. Of course it varies on different articles.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but on an average what is it?

Mr. McLEAN. I can not tell the Senator what the average is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would not be over 50 per cent; would it?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know. I can not tell the Senator. A great many of our products are highly specialized in their process of manufacture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would it be over 40 per cent?

Mr. McLEAN. I can not tell the Senator what the average would be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just the difference in the cost of manufacture?

Mr. McLEAN. Just the difference in the cost of production here and in the competing countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator realize that the figures he has given are $400,000,000 for labor and $1,400,000,000 for the product; so that the total cost of labor is less than 30 per cent?

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator refuses to take into consideration the labor costs in the materials that are used. I am merely speaking of the wages that are paid by the manufacturer to his employees.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but if the total output of the factories amounts to $1,400,000,000, and the total amount paid for labor is $400,000,000, the factories are only paying out 30 per cent of the value of their product for labor; and yet the Senator is asking in this bill more than enough to compensate them for all their labor.

Mr. McLEAN. A great many of the products that our manufacturers use are highly fabricated when they come to Connecticut. The cost of their raw materials was $685,000,000. The value added by manufacture in Connecticut was $706,000,000. There is no such thing as raw material. The Senator knows that. The rate required would be much higher than the Senator intimates.

This year our mills are running about 60 per cent on the average. That would mean a decrease in the pay roll of 1919 of about $140,000,000, which is an important item; but that is a mere bagatelle when you compare the product of my State with the product of the United States, which exceeded $62,000,000,000 in 1919, I think, with a pay roll of over $10,000,000,000. I have no idea what the reduction is this year—it would be difficult to estimate it—but if there is a reduction throughout the Union as there has been in my State, the Senator must realize that our exports of manufactured products are comparatively a very small item compared with the total, and unless we maintain the purchasing power of the American people we are facing disaster.

On yesterday, in his declamation against the principle of protection against foreign competition, the Senator from Nebraska said that the United States ought not to follow the example of England and France. Both of those countries have within the year, as the Senator knows, established protective tariffs against importations from Germany, and I want to say to the Senator that the Allies to-day are more concerned over the method in which the reparation penalties are paid than they are over the amount, for they know that if they left their doors open to German competition their industrial life would be endangered.

The views of the Senator from Nebraska seem to me to be rather ominous. I know it is an attractive program for France and England and Italy to protect themselves against German importations and for us to leave our doors open, so that Germany can freely export to us and make money enough to pay the reparations; but where will that program lead us? I think our allies owe us something like $10,000,000,000. If Germany is to pay that obligation by exporting goods to us at a 20 per cent profit, we will have to buy about $50,000,000,000 worth of goods from Germany. I do not welcome that proposition.

I am sorry for Germany. I am sorry for the criminal ignorance which led her to her present state, but I do not see how we can help her by destroying ourselves, and I think it is a very serious thing for us to consider at this time, because Germany has concentrated her energies upon certain lines, which is a clever thing to do. She is picking out the things where the major value is labor. She has a surplus of labor and a shortage of raw materials, and she is using that labor as the only resource she has.

The victor forgets, but the vanquished does not forget, and I am inclined to believe that Germany would be glad to destroy our industrial independence if she could. We came to the rescue of our allies at a time when Germany had victory within her grasp, and I do not think it is advisable for this country now to follow the course we did in 1914, 1915, and 1916, when we faced the greatest war in history, when our political life was in danger, and we were then, as we are now, advised by a large number of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that our political life was not in danger, and we faced that war without a gun or a trained soldier. Now the gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber are reiterating the same principle which they advocated in 1914, 1915, and 1916, that we are in no danger of these importations from the low-cost countries of Europe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In other words, the Senator wants to continue a commercial war on Germany years after the military war has stopped?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it is not for the Senator from Connecticut to say or for the Senator from Nebraska to say. The commercial wars of the future will be fierce. I hope the wars of the future will be confined to commercial wars; but they will be fierce, and they will be fought to the finish. It would be blind folly to expect the contrary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that the manufactories in Connecticut can sell their products out in the West if a tariff is erected so as to make it impossible for the West to sell its agricultural products to Germany?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, we consumed in this country last year sixty and odd million bushels of wheat less than we did in 1920. The Senator does not seem to realize that our domestic market is more than 90 per cent of our total sales. Shall we sacrifice that for the 8 per cent we may get abroad? In manufactured products our exports are less than 4 per cent of our total manufactures.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator tell what this country is going to do with six or seven hundred million dollars of surplus agricultural products in the West, and an untold amount of agricultural products in the South, if we shut the door to Germany selling goods to us?

Mr. McLEAN. Pass this bill; restore confidence in this country; set your idle men to work; increase the purchasing power of the American workingman, and he will take care of that surplus.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The American workingman can not eat up two or three hundred million bushels of wheat which we raise every year more than the American people can consume. He never has been able to do it.

Mr. McLEAN. The foreign countries which want our wheat, and have the money to pay for it, will buy it. The Senator knows that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have not the money. They have to pay in products, and the Senator proposes to shut their products out.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator proposes that that money shall be furnished by our buying goods in Germany of German laboring men, with the result that the laboring men of this country will walk the streets. That is what I object to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator this question: Did we not have a prosperous time during the period when we were selling about $380,000,000 worth of goods to Germany and Germany was selling about $180,000,000 worth of goods a year to us?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator forgets that 50 per cent of our foreign trade is in noncompetitive articles. We should increase that trade. We can do it if we will increase the purchasing power of our own people. Foreign nations can do that if they will pay their laboring men a living wage, and they should follow our example, and we should deny their right to drag our standard of living down to theirs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator would not answer my question, then. I asked him whether he objects to restoring the prosperous conditions which existed before the war, when we were selling about $370,000,000 worth of goods to Germany and Germany was selling $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 worth of goods to us? At the present time Germany is buying only half of that.

Mr. McLEAN. To what year does the Senator refer?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All the years; the average years before the war.

Mr. McLEAN. We have had good protective tariffs for a great many years. The only time we did not have protection was in the few months of the operation of the Underwood Act, when in my State we had serious conditions of unemployment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator whether he objects to restoring that condition of trade under which we sold twice as much to Germany as Germany sold to us; whether he insists on keeping us in the condition in which we now are, when we are buying only half what we formerly did in Germany?

Mr. McLEAN. I am telling the Senator that if we pass this bill and restore confidence in this country, so that our laboring men can have profitable employment, that will be taken care of. That is what we want, and without it we have no future. When we do that, and when Germany follows our example and pays her labor a living wage, there will be no difficulty about a tremendous foreign commerce in noncompetitive articles. Will the Senator tell me what economic benefit there is in carting chains from Germany to this country which can be made in this country just as well as they can in Germany? You have to pay transportation costs, commission cost, and bankers' discount. It is a dead loss to some one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why does the Senator ask me that question? He knows we are not doing that thing. I read the figures of the imports. We practically have no imports of chains from Germany.

Mr. McLEAN. We will come to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are producing millions of dollars worth of chains a year, and our total imports of chains for the first quarter of this year were only $14,000 from all the countries of the world, yet the Senator talks about carting chains over here.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator referred to a prosperous year. Let me call his attention to 1914, when the imports of chains from Germany increased from $39,000 to $150,000 in nine months. If it had not been for the war, and if the importations had increased in proportion, we would not now be making a chain in this country. The potential competition is there, the actual competition is here, and if we do not protect them our chain manufacturers will be driven out of business, and the business is exceedingly dull to-day. I know, and I will agree with the Senator, that there are many contributing causes to the present business depression; but the controlling factor in the future will be competition from abroad in the products produced by laboring men who get from 6 to 8 cents an hour, when our laboring men, engaged in producing similar goods, get from 30 to 40 cents an hour.

I did not intend to take so much time discussing this proposition, but I want the Senator to understand that on a very large percentage of these chains the labor cost is 65 per cent, and I want him to understand that there are importations coming in, and serious competition is threatened. I call his attention to the fact that the rates as recommended by the Finance Committee on the cheaper grades are as low as the rates in the Underwood law, if not lower. The seven-eighths cent a pound rate on the heavy chains would not exceed 18 per cent ad valorem at the present prices. We thought that if we fixed the rates on these heavy chains at lower than the Underwood rates under existing conditions we would escape these daily speeches from Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who insist that their law is a tariff-for-revenue-only law; but it seems there is no escape from it. Nothing is satisfactory but absolute free trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator referring to the figures which the committee brought in or those which they have modified?

Mr. McLEAN. I am referring to the recommendation of the committee, the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As printed in the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. As submitted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator admits that the recommendation which the committee made, as printed in the bill, is higher than the Underwood tariff?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and I think it ought to be. I will say frankly to the Senator that I had to subordinate my view with regard to the rate on chains to that of the majority of the committee. I know there are large concerns in my State, and I know that business with them is very dull. I know their orders are not coming in, and I know the reason why is that their former customers have notified them that they can get imported chains from 2 to 3 cents a pound less than the same chains can be made for in my State.

I have here three or four recent importations which I will place in the RECORD: On April 26, 1922, the Imperial Knife Co., of Providence, R. I., purchased 800 gross of knife chains made of No. 19 double-jack chain with sheet-metal button loop from a New York importing house at $1.75 per gross delivered, duty paid. That is much below the bare cost of the American chain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What date was that?

Mr. McLEAN. That was April 26, 1922.

On June 5, 1922, H. S. Brouwer, district manager of the American Chain Co., reports that Miller & Stein, of Wheeling, W. Va., had ordered 10 casks of chain from Szel Corporation, 393 Broad Street, New York City, importers. This chain consisted of one-fourth inch BB 5-16 proof, which are types of chain in common use. The price of both sizes of chain was 3 cents per pound under the quoted prices of the American Chain Co.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What was the total bill?

Mr. McLEAN. It was 10 casks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What was the amount of the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator mean the price?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The total amount.

Mr. McLEAN. Ten casks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How much money?

Mr. McLEAN. I can not tell the Senator. I will give him the price per hundredweight. The foreign price per hundredweight was $6.75. The domestic price for precisely the same article was $9.75 per hundredweight.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That shows the American chain makers are charging too much.

Mr. McLEAN. That is for the Senator to say. I realize the Senator is a newspaper man and has not had any experience in manufacturing, but if he had 1,000 hands to pay every week, and 60 per cent of them were walking the streets, he would realize that the American workingman is entitled to fair consideration when we are discussing a tariff bill, and that is all I want. I have been accused here again and again of asking for exorbitant rates. I have no such purpose. I have no such desire. All I want is to protect the American workingman, in order that the present standard of wage may be maintained in this country. I defy any Senator to indicate anything that I have said or done that seeks for a higher rate of duty.

On another importation of five-sixteenths inch chain, the domestic price was $7.50 per hundred and the foreign price, duty paid, was $4.50 per hundred. These are actual importations, and the Senator will see that the rates recommended by the committee fall far short of equalizing the difference in the price.

I have another example to which I will call attention. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not leave the Chamber, because he has challenged Senators on this side to present a single importation of these goods. The William H. Whiting Co., ship chandlers, of Baltimore, Md., report under date of June 7, 1922, that Szel Corporation has offered chain in any size, delivered from New York stock at Baltimore, 1 cent per pound less than the quotation of the American manufacturers, and 2 cents per pound less than the American manufacturers on board ship Hamburg.

Here is another instance: S. G. Taylor Co., chain manufacturers, of Chicago, Ill., report that imported chain is being sold in increasing quantities in that district and that customers have been advised of quotations on foreign chain which are less than the American market prices by the following amounts: Three-sixteenths inch, $2.25 per 100 pounds less; one-fourth inch, $2 per 100 pounds less. Those figures show that the rates which are provided in the bill are inadequate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. McLEAN. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When did this terrible importation of $200 worth of chains occur?

Mr. McLEAN. This was June 7, if the Senator refers to the last example I gave.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill with this tariff rate was made up a long time before that, and the bill was made up a long time before the figures which I have given of imports. I have shown the imports in the first three months of this year were almost nothing at all.

Mr. McLEAN. I am trying to show the Senator that the imports are coming in, and I do not think it is a crime to anticipate this flood of importation, because it is bound to come.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has shown only $200 worth of imports.

Mr. McLEAN. Much more than that, and they are increasing rapidly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I challenge the Senator to give the amounts.

Mr. McLEAN. I have given the amount. The last item I read offered a delivery of any amount. I have here a letter dated June 7, 1922, written by Mr. W. C. Perkins, sales manager of the William H. Whiting Co., of Baltimore, addressed to the American Chain Co., of New York, and reading as follows:

A number of our customers have complained to us recently that our prices have not been right on chain. Owing to the arrangements we have with your company, we have felt all along that we were in a position to sell your chain to most anyone at the right figure. We have been trying now for some time to find out just what the trouble was, and we think we have reached the solution.

A short time ago we had a representative of the Szel Corporation, located at 393 Broad Street, New York, come into our place and endeavor to sell us some German chain. We stated we were not interested in chain from abroad, and he said he felt sure we did not know the situation when we made the above statement, as he was in position to make us buy his chain, and he then produced a lot of orders which he had taken for chain in various parts of the United States, both from large dealers and consumers, and a number of these we recognize as being from some of our customers. He then stated he was in a position to ship us any size chain desired from New York stock at a price 1 cent lower than the American market, delivered at Baltimore, or 2 cents per pound less than the American market, to be shipped from Hamburg, Germany.

Mr. President, it may be that the importations just now are not large in value, but the offers are here and they are demoralizing the sale of American chains because the offers are general. They will deliver any amount at from 1 to 2 cents per pound less than the American price.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, can the Senator tell me the American price of quarter-inch chain?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I can not say. I would say the average price of chain would be about 12 cents a pound. I think the larger chains are about 4 to 5 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator know that before the war those chains sold for 5.31 cents per pound?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and they went up during the war, as the Senator knows. Since that time the price has decreased very rapidly, showing that there is fierce competition in this country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny that, because my reports show they are selling now for twice what they sold for before the war. It may be that the Senator had better investigate the prices at which these chains are being sold on the American market. Perhaps that is the reason why the imports are coming in.

Mr. McLEAN. I have investigated, and I think my investigation has been more thorough than that of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are 12 cents, the Senator said.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I did not say so. I said the average price of chains at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And before the war it was less than 6 cents.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no; I said the very cheap chains I think at that time were between 4 and 5 cents a pound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me refer the Senator to the figures given in the official report. In 1913 the price of ¼-inch chain was $5.30 a hundred; in 1914, $5.55; in 1915, $5.55; in 1916, $5.80; in 1917, $7; in 1918, $11.55; in 1919, $18.25. The Senator has stated that now it is approximately $12.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I think on that chain it is down to about 6 cents a pound now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator said 12 cents.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I said the average price of all the chains was about 12 cents. The price is $5.50 now, the expert advises me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On ¼-inch chain?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator answered my question a while ago that it was 12 cents.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no. It is $5.50 on 1-inch chain at this time. The price of 1-inch chain is $5.50. The Senator will see that seven-eighths of a cent per pound is less than the Underwood rate on that chain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President. I shall detain the Senate only a few moments. The paragraph under consideration, as originally reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee, made a very material increase in the rates not only of the present law but of the Payne-Aldrich law. I have not the ad valorem equivalent of the increase, but the specific rates are considerably higher than the Payne-Aldrich law specific rates. The Committee on Finance also proposed to amend the House bill by increasing the rate of the bill on sprocket and machine chains made of iron or steel from 30 to 50 per cent. Then they added to the House bill an amendment which provided:

But no chain or chains of any description, except anchor and stud-link chain, shall pay a duty of less than 45 per cent ad valorem.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] claims that one of the specific rates which the committee have provided is lower than the Underwood rates by 2 per cent. That may be true, Mr. President, as to the particular size chains to which the Senator refers, but under the original amendment as reported by the committee that lesser specific rate would have been of no value whatever to the consumer because of the proviso that none of the specific rates imposed upon chains should be less than 45 per cent. That proviso shows the committee intended to impose specific rates none of which would be less than 45 per cent ad valorem. That is one of the devices by which, when the rate imposed is specific, the high rate is maintained when the price of the article increases to a point where the specific rate is not so effective in excluding imports as was intended. That vice runs all through this bill. Certain specific rates are imposed and then a proviso is inserted that none of the specific rates shall be less than a certain ad valorem. If these rates have been reduced by the committee's modified amendment to a more reasonable level than originally reported, this action has been taken because of the protest that has been made upon the floor of the Senate and by the press and public. I am exceedingly gratified that the committee are yielding to this pressure to reduce the rates originally proposed. It is but another illustration of the fact that they are finally beginning to realize that the rates originally reported by it to the Senate were excessive, and that unless material reductions are made they would have difficulty in passing it through the Senate.

Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of going into a detailed discussion of the pending paragraph, because the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has discussed it pretty thoroughly. I do wish, however, to call attention to some general facts with reference to the particular industry involved, namely, the manufacture of chains. I am going to read from the report of the Tariff Commission with reference to the industry. The Tariff Commission says:

> The investment in the chain industry in 1918 amounted to approximately $5,000,000; the output was valued at about $10,000,000.

Since that time the investment in the industry has very greatly increased.

> The chief raw material is iron or steel in bars or heavy wire.

Of this the American manufacturers have an abundant domestic supply.

Senators seem to fear only German competition. It is a well-known fact that at this particular time Germany is somewhat embarrassed with respect to her supply of both coal and iron. I think it would hardly be claimed that Germany was quite upon a parity with us with respect to the principal raw materials that enter into the manufacture of this product.

Again, Mr. President, the Tariff Commission furnishes information with reference to this particular industry in Germany. It says:

> In the Westphalia chain-making district in Germany and in the Cradley Heath district in England part of the output is produced by hand by outworkers who obtain the iron and coke necessary from their employers, work up the chain in their own little shops, and return the completed article to their employers.

The date of this report of the commission is 1921, and it advises us that at this time in one of the chief chain-producing districts in Germany these chains are made in the little shops at the home of the laborer who produces them, while in America the commission advises us the chains are made by automatic or semiautomatic machinery. So we have this condition: In Germany, to a large extent, in one of the chief chain-manufacturing districts they are still using the old method of making chains with primitive home-run machines, while in this country we make those chains on a large scale with automatic machinery. It is ridiculous to my mind to try, Mr. President, to ascertain the relative labor cost of production by comparing the wages paid to the laborer where the process of conversion is such as employed in Germany, at least in the Westphalia district, with the wages paid labor where the process of conversion is by highly efficient automatic machinery. The wages paid to labor working the German machines may be small, but the amount of labor that is required to turn out a given quantity is large as compared with the labor in the highly organized plants of America with their efficient machinery.

I do not wish now to elaborate that point. I think it is perfectly clear that, in a case of this kind, in ascertaining the difference between the labor cost in Germany and the labor cost in a factory in this country, we should not take the price paid the laborer in the little home plant where he works, but we should take the labor cost of the product turned out by such labor and compare it with the labor cost of the product turned out in an up-to-date factory in America.

I do not know to what extent that method of producing chains exists in Germany and England to-day, but I do know that the Tariff Commission calls especial attention to the fact that that old method is still in vogue in one of the chief chain-manufacturing districts of Germany.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that in the early part of the argument something was said with reference to this industry probably not being under the control of a monopoly. I do not know to what extent the business has been monopolized, but I discover from reading the report of the Tariff Commission that there has been a wonderful and a very suspicious absorption of certain plants which were in existence in 1913 and engaged in the manufacture of chains.

The commission says:

> In 1913 John C. Schmidt—

This is from the commission's report—> of the Standard Chain Co., of Pittsburgh, estimated that $4,000,000 was invested in the chain industry. The output he estimated at $6,500,000. The number of firms was 31.

That was in 1913. The commission says:

> The present tendency in the chain industry is toward combination of firms, larger plants, and greater investment in equipment—manufacture by hand giving way to manufacture by automatic machinery. The total investment in the chain industry in the United States in 1918—> was approximately $5,000,000, divided among some 15 corporations.

That is, five years afterwards—

So that, Mr. President, in five years, instead of an increase in the number of manufacturers of chains in this country, 16 of the 31 plants had been absorbed by and consolidated into the remaining 15. When you discover that sort of absorption going on in any particular industry, Mr. President, you may be pretty well assured that the foundation of the whole scheme is the creation of a condition that is tantamount to a monopoly in the industry. Especially is that true with reference to the price paid by these associated or combined operators or manufacturers, both for their raw material and for their finished product. It may be that the monopoly has not yet been completed in the chain industry, but these facts, furnished us by the Tariff Commission, constitute cogent testimony that if a monopoly in this industry does not exist now it is rapidly approaching consummation.

But, Mr. President, what is the ground for the alarm now expressed by the Senator from Connecticut? What is the justification for the increase proposed originally by the committee or the modified rates proposed by the committee, in view of the fact that under existing rates none of the evils which they now say they so much deplore and so much fear have been brought about or exist to-day?

I do not want to take the time of the Senate in reading the figures with reference to imports and exports of this particular article, but I do wish to call attention to the fact that now we are told that the chain producers of this country are in imminent danger of being wiped out of existence by heavy foreign imports, thrown upon the American markets at prices with which they can not compete. The actual facts of the situation show that in 1921—which was very nearly a normal year—the total imports of chains of all kinds into this country amounted to only 223,371 pounds, while in 1908 the imports of these very articles amounted to 786,000 pounds, in round numbers, or three times as much as during last year. In 1909 they amounted to 700,000 pounds, or nearly two and one-half times as much, roughly estimating.

In 1910 under the Payne-Aldrich law—and the modified amendment of the Senate committee restores the Payne-Aldrich specific rates—the importations were 797,000 pounds, or more than three times as much as they were in 1921. In 1911, under the Payne-Aldrich law, the imports were 1,146,000 pounds, in round numbers. In 1912 they were 518,000 pounds. In 1913 they were 650,000 pounds; and there has been no year since 1908 when the chains that were imported into this country, not only from Germany but from the whole world, were not more than twice what they were in 1921.

The truth is, Mr. President, that, so far as Germany is concerned, her activity in the manufacture of metals of this character has practically broken down. Her trade is largely confined to producing what the domestic market requires, and until she is able to improve her situation with reference to a supply of iron and coal that condition is likely to exist. So that there is no justification for this duty growing out of the importations, and this is true, as we have shown, with respect to a large number of the articles that we have discussed here upon the floor of the Senate. When, however, we have shown that present importations were negligible, that they were far below those that existed before the war, we have always been met with the suggestion that that may be true, and that it must be admitted that that is true, because the Government records show it is true, with respect to the present time, but it is apprehended that a different condition with respect to the importations of this article will be created in the near future, or, if not in the near future, then in the distant future; and so we are presenting ourselves to the American people in the attitude of passing a bill here to deal with a situation that is purely a creature of the mind.

The only other reason which has been advanced here why we should increase the present rates, or why we should impose the extravagant rates that the committee has suggested with reference to this and other items, is that the prices at which the importations are offered in this market are so much below the prices at which the domestic products are selling in the market that if importations come in at all they disturb the equilibrium of business in this country.

Mr. President, that argument can not obtain as to this particular item, because I have before me the prices of the foreign importations of chains, beginning with 1908, down to the present time; and I find that in 1908 the unit value of these chains was 7.2 cents; in 1909, 6.5 cents; in 1910, 5.4 cents; in 1911, 6.1 cents; and so on, never going up until the war above 11 cents. They reached 11 cents in 1914 They were 6 cents in 1913. They went to 11 cents in 1914, and then they went up higher during the war; but except during two years they never went above the present price. They were the war years of 1915 and 1916.

The present invoice or landing cost of these chains—that is, the 1921 cost—is given by the official statistics at 12.6 cents a pound, 5 cents a pound higher than in any year during the existence of the Payne-Aldrich law. If we could compete against the prices that obtained during the four years of the Payne-Aldrich law, if the lower prices of that period did not destroy the American manufacturer, how can it be contended that present prices, practically 80 per cent higher than those which obtained before the war, are so low that it is impossible for the American manufacturer to live in competition with such prices? So that we have an answer, and a complete answer, to both of the arguments made in favor of the high rate; first, from 200 to 300 per cent decrease in imports, and, secondly, an 80 per cent increase in the landed cost of the foreign article.

I do not wish to detain the Senate, and did not rise except for the purpose of putting into the RECORD the facts about this matter. I do not wish to elaborate them. I am content to let them go into the RECORD and speak for themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, four days ago the chairman of the Finance Committee offered an amendment to this paragraph, and up to the present time we have had no chance whatever of voting on the pending amendment. What is the pending amendment? I take it for granted that all the criticisms which have been offered have been offered against the pending amendment to the chain paragraph.

Mr. President, it does not make any difference what the committee does, whether they lower the rates of existing law, or whether they increase them; it seems that there must be hours and hours of criticism of the committee. If I have any fear at all in relation to the pending amendment, it is that the rate proposed by the committee is too low. That is my only fear. I want the Senate to understand that the rates now proposed in this paragraph are lower than the rates in existing law for the same articles, outside of sprocket chains and machine chains, on which the rates are increased only 10 per cent; and the cost of making those chains is quite different from that described by the Senator from North Carolina. No matter whether we decrease the existing rates or not, the rates we propose are criticized as extravagant.

I wonder if the Senator from North Carolina has ever visited England and Germany and seen the chain makers and the chain workers in those two countries? He took particular delight in referring to the fact that these chains were made in small plants at the homes of the chain makers. God grant that never in America shall there be conditions such as have existed in those two countries. I have been there. I have seen those poor women, back broken, handling chains, paid a pittance, the children helping the mother make chains, simply to get enough food to eat and to help the husband who was doing something else in some other industry in that country, to get sufficient food and clothing to make it possible for them to exist. I never want to see such a condition in America. I never want to see a girl of mine, or the girl of any man living, or any American mother, or the wife of any man living, be compelled to do such work in America.

These rates are lower than those in the existing law, and I say to the Senator that we have lowered the rates of existing law because of to-day's high prices of the articles. I look to see the prices of chains decrease, and when they do, having a specific duty, of course the equivalent ad valorem will increase; but if chains remain at the same price they bring to-day, every rate we propose now will be lower than those in existing law—this Democratic law referred to so often by the critics of the pending bill. The equivalent ad valorem rate in 1908 was 17.4 per cent. In 1909 it was only 11.6 per cent, and yet existing law carries 20 to 25 per cent, according to the size of the chain.

The average price of the importations for the nine months of 1921 was 12½ cents a pound. Twenty per cent of 12½ is 2½ cents a pound, and in the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee we begin with seven-eighths of a cent a pound. The duty on the highest of the very small chains, which cost from 30 to 35 cents a pound, is only 3 cents a pound.

We have cut out the provision found in the Payne-Aldrich law that no chain shall pay a lower duty than 45 per cent. I think if there is any rate as to which there can be no criticism offered by any Senator it is the rate proposed in this paragraph.

I have the figures here showing the specific rates, and also the equivalent ad valorem rates. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read them, because I think it is time that we should take a vote upon the pending amendment, and I am perfectly willing to join the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Nebraska in asking that a yea-and-nay vote be taken on these rates. I want Senators to vote whether they want to decrease the existing duty or not, and, as far as I am concerned, if there is no one else who wishes to speak, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of gratification to a part of the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. He grew very eloquent. The Senator, like myself, is not naturally eloqent, and he never becomes eloquent until he becomes very much aroused and excited. I share his indignation, and I share his expression of a hope that we shall never in the United States have the conditions in this or in any other industry which he described as obtaining in Germany with reference to the production of chains.

Mr. SMOOT. I ought to do justice to the German people and state that I am informed that in Germany of late they have ceased sending chains to the homes of the people of Germany and having the women and children make the same, and they have of late gotten the machinery which makes them in the same way we make them.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Tariff Commission announces the abolition of the old custom of working women and children in the home chain-making plants. That, of course, is an advance which is gratifying to me, as I know it is to the Senator from Utah; but the commission assert, and the Senator, I understand, corroborates them, that to a certain extent the old custom of manufacturing chains in the little home plants obtains—a crude, primitive method. You might pay the laborers engaged in the making of those chains by that crude machinery only 5 cents a day, and yet the labor cost of that article would be very great. So that all this talk about the low prices paid the German laborer in these little home shops gets you nowhere, because the relative cost of production can not be ascertained by comparing the wages paid labor—where there is such difference in methods and efficiency and results the two things are not comparable.

A better illustration, and one which will be understood more readily by the people, is the product of the shoemaker. A shoemaker working on his stool would probably turn out only one pair of shoes a day, and would be doing very good work at that.

How can you, in decency, compare the labor cost of a pair of shoes made by the shoemaker in the old way on the basis of the wage paid the shoemaker with the labor cost of a pair of shoes made on machines on the basis of the wage paid the operator of the machine? One laborer working a machine producing shoes will probably make 150 dozen pairs of shoes a day. The labor cost of that 150 dozen pairs is only the wages paid one man, and it would take 150 men making shoes by the old method at the rate of one pair a day to make as many shoes a day as one man makes in the same time with the up-to-date machinery of shoe factories of America to-day.

The same is true of chain making. The probabilities are that one man laboring on one operating machine in one of the great chain factories in this country will turn out as many feet of chain as 20 men will turn out working with the crude machines which they used in the homes of the Germans to make similar chains.

We can not compare the wage paid to the man who produces so little with the wage paid to the man who produces so much. They bear no relation one to the other in estimating the actual labor cost. I hope that condition will never obtain in this country, but it does obtain in a competing country, and as long as it obtains in a competing country there is no sense in talking about our inability to compete with that country. As long as Germany makes chains with these crude implements, there will be no trouble about America competing with her in the manufacture of those materials. It requires no argument to convince the man of common sense and intelligence on that proposition, I think.

Now, the Senator from Utah said that the rates in his bill, as modified by his amendment, will be less than the rates of the present law. I do not think so; but the Senator when he made that confession admitted that our criticisms of his bill are justified, because it is as the result of our criticisms and the effect of those criticisms upon the public sentiment of the country and the Senate that the committee voluntarily cut down its rate, according to the Senator, about one-half. He claims now they will not be in excess of 20 per cent; but as he brought his bill in here, and as he asked the Senate to adopt it, he had a provision that the specific rate should never be less than 45 per cent ad valorem. That is rather bunglingly expressed; that is to say, if the specific rate he had imposed upon these articles as the result of the increase in price fell below 45 per cent ad valorem, then the specific rate was not to apply, but the 45 per cent ad valorem rate was to apply. I do not think the Senator ought to criticize us. He ought rather to say that we have served the public well, because our efforts have resulted in inducing him to cut his rate in half.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. The specific rate on these different chains has been reduced so that there will be an effectual reduction to 20 per cent. As I understood the Senator from Utah, he said they have reduced the ad valorem down to about 20 per cent. Did I understand that correctly?

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that at the value of the chains to-day the specific rate as reported now by the chairman of the committee, wherever it is 20 per cent to-day, will be less than 20 per cent, and wherever the rate is 25 per cent it will be less than 25 per cent.

Mr. SMITH. That is as a result of the modification of the specific and ad valorem rates on this article?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I stated to the Senate just why that was done. The Senator was not in the Chamber. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe the price of chains will remain where it is to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is very plain. The Tariff Commission says the average computed ad valorem rate on dutiable imports for the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913, under the act of 1909, was approximately 47.5 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, the Senator knows——

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator. If he will wait, I will develop it. I understood his argument about the price.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what I wanted to say. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the reason for that was because they have the 45 per cent minimum rate applied in the act of 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no, Mr. President; that was not it at all. It said the rate computed was that figure. That provision only said if the specific rate did not reach 45 per cent then the specific rate should be abandoned and 45 per cent ad valorem adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has already said they were abandoned.

Mr. SIMMONS. The calculation is not made with reference to the 45 per cent proviso at all in the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is made with reference to the rates in the Payne-Aldrich law, and the rates exceed the 45 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the very reason why, because there was none fell less than 45, and some of the sprocket chains and finer chains were higher, and so the average was 45; but the equivalent ad valorem in 1908 was 17 per cent and the specific rate was exactly the same, so what the Tariff Commission said is true. None of them came in less than 45 per cent, and the sprocket chain and quarter-inch chains brought the average up to 47 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can not escape the fact, however, that as that law was written it amounted to 47 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the Senator said that 47 per cent would not be 20 per cent, because the foreign price of the chains has increased from an average of a little over 6½ or 7 cents to 12 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator must not misquote me. I said the sprocket chains and machine chains under the amendment offered were 35 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about sprocket chains.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the average took the sprocket chains and all kinds of chains. We can not take an average unless we take them all in. As I said, the specific rates which are enumerated in the bill on the average will be less than the rates in the existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken, but if the Senator is basing his calculation upon the present high prices of chains, then I can not see any justification for the argument that the American manufacturer at this time is being damaged by an exceptionally low price charged in the American market for the foreign product. If the price of chains has gone up to the point where it pulls down the rate of the specific duty practically 100 per cent when measured in ad valorem equivalent, then it seems to me that the whole case upon which the proponents of the bill rest their proposition to increase rates falls to the ground. I ask the Senator why in this state of facts his committee reported out a rate twice as high as the rate which he now proposes?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite understand what the Senator meant by his last statement. I could have answered the fore part of it, but as I understood the Senator, one part conflicted with the other. If the Senator will repeat his question I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked if the rate the Senator originally proposed in the bill would not have been very much higher than the rate which he now proposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly; and that is what I have said.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, then, did the Senator propose the other rate in view of the fact that he admits now that the prices of chains are double what they were before the war?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I stated that very plainly to the Senate when I said that I expect the price of chains to decline, and I also stated that if I had any fear at all about the rate that has been proposed by the committee it was that under existing conditions, if they were to continue to exist, the rate would be too low.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the Senator said he expects the price of foreign chains to decline.

Mr. SMOOT. I expect the price of chains to decline not only in foreign countries but in this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. And as they decline the Senator's specific rate measured in ad valorem will go up, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It will, and perhaps it will reach about the existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. And if they declined to the point at which they sold before the war then the Senator's ad valorem equivalent rate would be 45 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong. If he will take the importations for 1908 or 1909, he will find there was exactly the same rate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Forty-seven per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. On these chains the price was 17.4 cents, and to-day the price would not amount to that rate which we have reported here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am ready for a vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays. Would the Senator like to have the amendment voted on as a whole or divided?

Mr. SIMMONS. I want it divided.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I ask that the vote be on the first amendment, on page 64, line 15, before "1," to insert seven-eighths of," so as to read "seven-eighths of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not wish to divide it to that extent. I was going to move to strike out, beginning in line 15, after the word "steel," down to and including the word "pound," in line 20, and insert in lieu thereof:

Not specifically provided for in this section, 20 per cent ad valorem.

On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the same rate as provided by existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the rate of the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr.

COLT] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Washington has not voted.

Mr. SWANSON. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Washington, which I transfer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and let my vote stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH of Montana] is necessarily absent on account of an urgent matter which claimed his attention. He will be absent on the same account for several days. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and let my vote stand.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. McKINLEY (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Trammell
Culberson	La Follette	Robinson	Underwood
Harrison	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams
Heflin	Myers	Simmons
Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson

NAYS—39.

Borah	Gooding	McCumber	Phipps
Bursum	Hale	McKinley	Poindexter
Calder	Harreld	McLean	Rawson
Capper	Johnson	McNary	Shortridge
Curtis	Kellogg	Moses	Smoot
Dillingham	Keyes	Nelson	Townsend
Edge	Ladd	Newberry	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lenroot	Nicholson	Watson, Ind.
France	Lodge	Norbeck	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Oddie

NOT VOTING—39.

Ball	Elkins	Norris	Stanfield
Brandegee	Ernst	Owen	Stanley
Broussard	Fletcher	Page	Sterling
Cameron	Gerry	Pepper	Sutherland
Caraway	Glass	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Colt	Harris	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Crow	Jones, Wash.	Reed	Warren
Cummins	Kendrick	Shields	Watson, Ga.
Dial	King	Smith	Weller
du Pont	New	Spencer

So the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] on behalf of the committee.

HOSPITAL FACILITIES FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I read from an article in the New York Herald of this morning, June 23, on page 6. Unlike my friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], I have no jeremiads to chant over the metropolitan press; I think the newspapers give us a reasonably fair summary of what takes place. I hope the article I am now going to read is not true, but if it be true, then the committee appointed by Senate Resolution 59 has a duty to perform:

[From the New York Herald, Friday, June 23, 1922.]

VETERANS SAY RICH BAR HOSPITAL SITES—LEGION CHARGES WESTCHESTER RESIDENTS MADE GOVERNMENT ABANDON OPTION—VASSAR ALSO OBJECTS—REPORT CITES OBSTACLES MET IN SEEKING NEW YORK LOCATIONS FOR WAR VICTIMS.

NEW YORK HERALD BUREAU,
Washington, D. C., June 22.

In an article made public to-day as the second of a series by the American Legion giving a history and critical review of the work of the United States Veterans' Bureau, it is charged that wealthy New Yorkers, Vassar College, and other persons and interests have impeded deliberately the selection of hospital sites in New York. The Veterans' Bureau and the White committee of the bureau are excused to a large extent in the statement because of alleged outside and political opposition met on locations at every turn.

The Veterans' Bureau has announced since the article was prepared the location of a million-dollar hospital at Liberty, N. Y. Another is to be in the metropolitan area.

CALLS OPPOSITION VICIOUS.

Congressional authorization for the hospitals has been standing for approximately two years. The legion article says:

"In the populous areas of western Pennsylvania and the metropolitan district of New York, where the suffering among veterans because of a lack of hospital facilities is most severe, the White committee has been defeated absolutely in its efforts to acquire sites. In New York this opposition has been unspeakably vicious and selfish in character.

"The first locations chosen, one on Staten Island and one on Long Island, were discarded when Government officials and experts were unable to agree. Time passed and a third site was found in Westchester County, which adjoins New York City on the north. Climatic conditions were ideal, and there is no more beautiful country anywhere than the landscaped hills of Westchester. In fact it is too beautiful—too beautiful for disabled soldiers. Westchester is a region of magnificent estates where the rich of New York get back to nature de luxe.

"When it was learned that the Government had acquired right of option on a certain acreage the well fixed and influential property owners roundabout went straight up in the air. A hospital for crippled soldiers in these exquisite hills? Preposterous.

"One leader of community sentiment informed members of the White committee that unless efforts to place a hospital there were abandoned immediately he would simply get his friend Secretary Mellon on the long-distance telephone and unpleasantries might ensue. A Congressman, eager to please his wealthy constituents, also intervened and the White committee tossed in the sponge. Time dragged on.

"The White scouts moved up the Hudson, out of the country estate belt, picking a tract near Poughkeepsie. Here Vassar College, though situated more than 3 miles from the proposed hospital location, led the opposition.

"The fight was adroitly conducted.

"The veterans lost, but after a lull of a few weeks the White committee apparently refused to call it quits, for the following is a copy of a letter, bearing the signatures of two high officers of the college, which is being forwarded by the college directors to influential persons:

"'The commission who were to locate hospitals for treatment of disabled ex-service men who are tubercular selected a site in the vicinity of Vassar College, where several hundreds of the men could be placed. President MacCracken strongly objected and the executive committee unanimously indorsed his action. Assurance was given that the hospital would not be located in that place if the college objected.

"'But we learn that a determined effort is now being made by certain interested parties to have this decision reversed and this we are most anxious to defeat.

"'The objection by the college has nothing to do with the fact that the men are tubercular, but because we know that a proportion of these men would be a danger to such a community.'"

Mr. President, Congress has done its full duty on hospitalization so far as the construction of buildings is concerned. To summarize:

On March 4, 1921, $18,600,000 were appropriated to expand existing hospital facilities and to increase hospital facilities. On April 20, 1922, $17,000,000 more were appropriated for the further hospitalization of ex-service men, making in all that Congress has appropriated within the past two years and two months $35,600,000. As soon as the act of March 4, 1921, was passed, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, appointed what is called the board of consultants. The chairman is Dr. William Charles White, of Pittsburgh, Pa. The other members of the board are Dr. John G. Bowman, of Pittsburgh; Dr. Frank Billings, of Chicago; and Dr. George H. Kirby, of New York City. There are also other physicians, who serve in advisory capacities. This board of consultants took up the question of hospitalization in a serious and intelligent manner with painstaking detail, and they visited site after site and obtained reports as to climatic conditions, water supply, and so forth.

This paper, the New York Herald, sounds an alarm, and it points out that although we have appropriated $35,600,000 for hospitalization of disabled soldiers, certain persons of opulence and influence have been trying to defeat the White committee in its efforts to select a site on the Hudson River for a soldiers' hospital.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 10874) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, which I ask may be held on the desk subject to call when that bill is under consideration.

The amendment was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table, as follows:

On page 6, after line 23, insert the following proviso: "(6) Provided, however, That nobody in possession of an income of $2,000 a year or more shall become a beneficiary under the operation of this act or any clause thereof."

TWO LECTURES BY SENATOR WILLIAMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In compliance with the request for unanimous consent granted me some days ago, I send to the desk the two lectures to which I referred, which were delivered at Port Gibson, Miss., and Memphis, Tenn., to be printed in the RECORD and in the regular RECORD type.

The lectures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AFTER THE ELECTION.

LECTURE NO. 1.

(Being a lecture delivered by Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, senior Senator from Mississippi, at Port Gibson, Miss., and at Memphis, Tenn., being one of two lectures referred to in his request for unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 20, 1922.)

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am to deliver two lectures, one about the League of Nations and another on the subject of "International Nagging"—a thing chiefly carried on in this country by certain hyphenates, certain yellow journals, and by certain demagogues who think thereby to find their profit in office getting, regardless of the threat of war involved in the process. I shall deliver the two lectures as though they were one, because they both touch the peace of the world. I shall divide the two lectures rather by the time taken in delivering them than topically.

"Some days ago I cut out of some paper a paragraph containing these words: 'The world is saved from the Prussians but it is not yet saved from itself.' There is great meaning in that sentence, for even if we have made the world safe for democracy, we must 'even go further' and make democracy safe for the world.

"As a result of the World War, 10,000,000 of men have ceased to live, 20,000,000 live maimed, and a debt of $200,000,000,000 of war costs rests on the shoulders of the people of Europe and America. A stupendous price to pay for anything short of a stupendous and permanent benefit! Was the war worth it? That depends in part, indeed in major part, on you. What was it all about? Are you to answer as the old man in the poem, 'How tall was Alexander, pa, that men should call him great,' answered the same question, 'I do not know, my child, but it was a glorious victory.'

"I am intensely interested in the League of Nations, or covenant of civilized nations for the peace of the world, as the President and I prefer to call it, and have been for years before the Great War made it a concrete and present instead of an academic question for future consideration. And yet the very right and wrong of it all has been for so very long a time so very plain in my mind that, as I said in Port Gibson, Miss., the other day, I hardly know where to begin and certainly do not know where to end the discussion of it. I am glad to talk about it after, rather than before, the election, because I can not now be charged with selfish, partisan motives. Majorities decide governmental action for the immediate future, not for the ultimate future, and no majority at any election ever yet settled a moral issue. Such an issue comes to stay until it is settled right. This is a moral issue and differs from any other only because it is international in its scope and involves governments rather than individuals as its instrumentalities and subjects of action.

"Talking about it is for me like making a speech on the text 'Thou shalt not steal' or, more analogously, 'Thou shalt not kill.' Of course, I do not mean by that that opposing the adoption of the covenant is as grave an offense as stealing or murdering—I am getting too old to indulge in that sort of extreme speech or thought. I merely mean that for me the duty of doing all I can to stop killing by wholesale—by the millions, as we have just witnessed, on land, on sea, and from the air—is as sacred as that of doing all I can to stop killing by retail, and that the duty of stopping international taking by the strong arm of territory and its population, which is wholesale stealing or robbery, is as sacred as the duty to do my bit in putting an end to other forms of grand or petty larceny or highway robbery.

"Do you, like me, want, without too minute inquiry into the details of the means adopted to the end, to do all you can; to try every expedient or experiment fraught, however remotely, with the slightest hope of success, to prevent war and filching by the strong of the territory and people of the weak—in a word, using the language of the covenant itself, to prevent 'external aggression' involving the 'independence and territorial integrity of nations'? Always of weak nations, remember, because the weak never wage wars of conquest against the strong. Do you want to try every conceivable means of preventing or minimizing the useless slaughter in wars of offense and conquest and aggression, having in your view the end of thereby preserving civilization, national and international solvency, and human progress in industry and the arts, on which depends the happiness of man and all his intellectual and moral culture and all industrial peace—all of them invariably disturbed by international warfare, with its disintegrating and demoralizing forces? Or will you, on the contrary, sunk in intellectual torpor, moral callousness, or parochial exclusiveness, or in an entire absorption in your own to-day's or to-morrow's personal and private interests, shortsightedly shake the whole problem off your shoulders and 'let the mad world wag as it may'? One or the other of these two things you will and must do, or try to do, by the position you take and hold on this question. The field of the details of past candidates' utterances and of party platforms we need not enter. They have less to do with it 'than the flowers that bloom in the spring.' The parting of the ways in grand outline is before you for future guidance so plain that the wayfaring man, though he run, can not help reading the two signs on the board: On one, 'This way to a new era providing peace and mutual trust and love'; on the other, 'This is the old road of distrust and hate and war.' The fight in America between the would-be travelers of these two roads has just begun.

"You may, for European racial reasons or out of mere moral laziness, attempt to obscure the issue with words; you may thereby for a time deceive others—counting on the heads, or the at first no heads, of the hydra-multitude—but you can not deceive yourselves and you can not fool God. Do you want or do you not want to do everything—anything—promising even approximately cessation of war, with its barbarity, atrocity, death, rape, hatred, widowing of women, orphaning of children, bankrupting of nations, burdening with woe of war suffering and weight of war costs, and the heavier weight of coming pensions, all to an extent beyond power to bear up under it? Are you indifferent whether or not this weight of war and woe of war shall continue from time to time to be placed on the bent backs of farmers and laborers and teachers and preachers—of all the sons and daughters of men—while we 'just go on in the old way'? If so, the trouble is that you will not go on, but will go under, 'in the old way.'

"Our part in the last war, forced on us as it was, unavoidable except at the cost of the loss of national self-respect, was manly and glorious. It proved that even now 'men know how to die' when for country's sake or liberty's or civilization's they must. It proved that women even to-day know how to bid men endure and, if need be, die.

"It proved that many things are worth more to man—even to the so-called common man—than mere continuance of earthly existence; that the average man even now can and does 'so love the world that he lay down his life for it'—for the good and noble in it—for its women and children, its culture, its democracy, its sense of justice, its righteousness of aim, and, above all, its ultimate peace. I say 'above all' because it is only under the shadow of the wings of the Angel of Peace that all these things can be properly born and can thrive, and that civilization, with so much difficulty wrung from the past, can ripen in the future into that beautiful and lovely fruition of enlightenment that those who love God and their fellow men do even now in a demoralized and reactionary present hope that they or their children may live to see.

"The war proved that 'the age of chivalry' has 'not gone,' Burke's lament notwithstanding; that the average man is not ignorant of the truth of Robert E. Lee's injunction to his son: 'Duty is the noblest word in the English language.' These things we found to be true of men from all over the world, but especially true of the men of the English-speaking race. In they came, trooping, these 'sons of English mold,' from Canada, from South Africa, from far-off Australia and New Zealand, from England, from Scotland—'lowland and highland in battle array'—from the stern mountains and sweet valleys of 'never conquered' Wales, from the States of this glorious American Republic, from all the islands of the sea, 'from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand,' from wherever live the sons of the glorious race that speaks the language Shakespeare spake and thinks the thoughts that Milton thought, and dreams the dreams that Tennyson dreamt—of this race which stands and has so long stood 'in the foremost files of time'—in they came trooping to the rescue of ravished Belgium, of torn Serbia, of bleeding France, of expiring democracy, with 'eyes front' and God's unseen hand on their shoulders driving them forward in high emprize 'to do or to die.' They proved in 'the old land' and in the new lands that those had cruelly slandered them who had said their religion was the idolatrous worship of dollars, pounds, shillings, and pence. They demonstrated, on the contrary, that they had not changed in character, courage, heroism, or endurance from those of their ancestors who demanded liberty at Runnymede, or stood with the Black Prince at Crecy and Poitiers or followed Richard 'of the lion heart' on the deserts of Syria and over the hills of Palestine, or 'summoned up their courage' with heroic Prince Hal at Harfleur and Agincourt, or from those who fought and won religious liberty with Drake and Howard as their ships met the hosts of the Spanish Armada and with the help of God's winds sank it in the North Sea, while their glorious queen, 'Great Elizabeth,' 'hurled proud scorn at Philip and at Spain'; or from those who, under Havelock, 'bearing the white man's burden,' under the heat and glare of an East Indian sun, entered Lucknow to the martial strains of 'The Campbells are coming' and saved its wounded men and famishing women and children; from those who climbed with Wolfe the Heights of Abraham and by his victory at Quebec completed the dedication of this continent to the English language, English literature, and English law, making it to-day the most priceless jewel in the crown of the race's possession. These boys of ours proved themselves worthily descended from those who wrested our coasts and mountains and valleys from savage men and yet more savage nature, and made of this continent the broadest domestic hearth on this earth, around which the sons and daughters of the race can now gather; worthily sprung from those who later at Lexington 'fired the shot which was heard around the world,' or with Washington starved and died and endured and prevailed at Valley Forge, or, finally with him at Yorktown carried to final victory the cause of American and English civil and political liberty, inherited from their ancestors across the sea and reasserted by them here, not only for themselves, but, as is now clearly seen, for Englishmen in England itself and in every English colony; worthy of their fathers who won with Sherman and Grant or lost with Jackson and Lee, 'greatly falling with a falling state,' and leaving fadeless names and unconquered renown for themselves and their cause. Our boys, the descendants of all these—your boys and mine—'proved the metal of their pastures' at Chateau-Thierry, on the Somme, at St. Mihiel, and in the Argonne, and proved that they had in them the blood of all of these, their glorious sires, and like them 'knew no count of self' when duty or country or liberty or justice or civilization called.

"But we did not summons them, nor did they go out of desire for dominion, for love of fighting, or out of hatred of any man or any people. They did not go, nor we summons them, until our great President—brought to the point where even his patience had ceased to be a virtue—had, for us, exhausted every honorable means to prevent the necessity of their going at all, and not until he had made it plain to all the world—friend and foe—that our purpose was to make not only America but all the world 'safe for democracy,' to conquer not for ourselves alone but for all the world a just and enduring peace,' not until he had made it plain amid our unanimous applause that we were, above all things, making war against not only 'war lords' but war itself, and against the whole old system of armed peoples under universal conscription involving the danger and horror of war's constant recurrence—against all this time-dishonored method of settling international controversies and conflicting national interests. On the points of our soldiers' bayonets was carried the meaning of the slogan of a British battalion, 'Going over the top' and driving the enemy; 'Never again, never again.'

"Was there a voice then to blame our martyr President for these his announced purposes? Were not these and our own defense and the world's defense against arrogant and insolent war aggression universally acclaimed? Were they not carried as the very 'testament of his faith' in the heart of each of our sons 'to Flanders and to France'? Did not our great chief announce beforehand that an international covenant of peace was the chief and holiest to-be-expected fruit of all our labors, battles, and expenditures? Was one man in all America then found bold enough, or mean enough, or provincial enough, or partisan enough, or short-sighted enough, or devil-serving and God-defying enough to say him 'nay'? Are you willing to lapse back into the old slough from which you dragged the world by its drowning locks? Glorious as were the deeds of our boys who returned, do they even wish a recurrence of the need of repeating them?

"Of those others who did not return, who are—I say advisedly are, not were—to be consulted; of those who—

> On Fame's eternal camping ground
> Their silent tents now spread;
> While glory guards with solemn round
> The bivouac of the dead.

may we not also ask the question: 'Do you wish a recurrence of it all for your brothers left on earth'?

"It seems to me that I can see and hear the sheeted dead as in solemn chorus they roll back an awful 'No; for what, then, did we die?'

"And pray you, my friends, 'for what'?

"That certain boundaries might be changed in Europe? That certain reparations might be made? That certain indemnities might be paid? Oh, the pathetic impotency of such a reply! Oh, the infinite meanness of him who makes such reply!

"But you may say, for many are saying it, 'We can not provide against such a recurrence. War is a necessity of human nature. It can not be prevented.'

"How do you and they know?

"Have you ever tried it?

"Has anybody ever sufficiently tried it?

"Are you willing with me to try it?

"Is it not worth trying?

"Is the trial not worth keeping up to the end, election or no election, temporary majority with us or against us?

"Does not the memory of the endurances and dangers of the living and of 'the great sacrifice' of the dead counsel you to answer that question 'Yes'? But there will be those who will still say 'war is a biological necessity and unavoidable.' There were those who once, not long ago, thought and said the same thing of dueling, I among them.

"But they say 'the covenant of peace is defective.'

"Of course it is; where were we to find angels or gods to draw it up?

"But they add, 'It needs amending.'

"Very probably; indeed, very certainly; and we shall on trial doubtless find that it needs amending even in some respects that are not now apparent, just as we found on trial with the old Articles of Confederation and with the present Constitution of the United States, that each of them needed amending. What human thing does not? Even you yourself need amending daily, though you 'made not yourselves.' But who is to amend it? We alone? One Nation? That question is arrogant and ought to answer itself. No; not one, but all they who enter into it, just as all the States are consulted to amend our Constitution.

"The league carries in itself a prescribed method of amendment, and the very amendment clause itself may be amended to make amendments easier.

"The old Articles of Confederation were amended by Constitutional Convention, and several times even by the Continental Congress submitting special questions, notably of territory, to the States. The present Constitution has also been amended 18 or 19 times now, we are not yet dead certain which, owing to the somewhat doubtful character of the conduct of you Tennesseeans. But by whom and how?

"Naturally by those who adopted it and as prescribed in the amendment clause, but not by one State. Many patriotic Virginians wanted to withhold Virginia's accession to the Federal Union under the present Constitution until it was amended, among them old George Mason—'noblest Roman of them all,' as Jefferson called him—and Patrick Henry, the very 'voice of the Revolution.' But the wisest two of all Virginians then living—Washington, on the ground, and Jefferson, then in France and writing from Paris—advised that Virginia accede and that the desired amendments be proposed by her to the Congress, to be proposed by it in turn to the States. Jefferson himself suggested amendments embodying a 'Bill of Rights' and regretted the lack of such guaranty of individual inalienable rights against all governments, whether State or Federal, as a defect in the original instrument. This course, advised by Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, and Light Horse Harry Lee and John Marshall, was pursued by Virginia.

"Several other States followed or preceded her in that course. As a result two things ensued: The Constitution was adopted and the first 10 amendments, involving the suggestions of the State conventions, were immediately proposed by the Congress and almost immediately adopted by the States. Our suggestion of any first amendment to the league would be as impotent now in Europe as Virginia's was then in America, and for much the same reasons.

"In the history of the world the instrument most analogous to the present proposed League of Nations that I can find was our system of union under the old Articles of Confederation among the American Colonies under which we fought and won the Revolution. As a form of government, or supergovernment, among the States it was a failure, for 'the plain, palpable, and obvious' reason that it was not intended for any such purpose, just as the present proposed League of Nations is not intended as a supergovernment, or government, indeed, of any kind at all, but simply for what its name purports—a 'league' or 'alliance' for certain limited purposes of peace and war prevention. But for the purposes of its creation, the old confederation was a sufficient success; those two purposes were, first, union among the Colonies for the fighting and winning of the war, and, second, peace among the Colonies themselves then and thereafter. Under it the war was carried to a successful issue, and during and after the war it justified itself as a league of American States—or nations, as they then were—under which a just and enduring peace among these States was maintained until public opinion, further matured and educated, demanded an American supergovernment, 'a more perfect union,' when, to accomplish this purpose, the new Constitution was framed and adopted. Some of the States never complied with all the demands of the Continental Congress; some of them failed to keep their solemn obligations; some duties to the confederation never have been performed even unto this good day; but as a covenant of peace among the States that were parties to the league or confederacy it worked.

"I doubt not some of the nations entering this league will fail in the performance of their full duty, especially at the first, when all will be more or less experimental. Human institutions, like human beings, must learn to walk by trying to walk. The council and the assembly may in given cases call, and the call may be unheard or unheeded by this or that State.

"But this must be, for the very reason that it is not, as its enemies urge, a supergovernment that we are seeking to effect, but a league—not, indeed, at all a government which acts on the individual nationals but an international congress to advise, council, and guide governments. Like our Articles of Confederation, it will operate not upon individuals, nor even upon governments, by authority over them, but through governments, each controlled by its own nationals, while the independent sovereignty of each nation is left untouched, neither sacrificed nor involved nor menaced. If any government in this league is called upon for embargo or for troops, neither will take form for that particular nation until its governmental agencies by its constitution, 'for such purposes made and provided,' shall take the appropriate action. In our own case, for example, if embargo against the outlaw nation be the course advised by the council of the league, a revenue bill regulating certain exports and imports and 'originating in the House of Representatives,' would have to pass Congress; if war was recommended, Congress would have to declare war. These things in other countries would have to be done by various governmental agencies there provided. Just so, under the Articles of Confederation the Continental Congress called on the States, making 'requisitions,' as they were called, for certain quotas of men or of money; but it required the action of each State to make the call or requisition effective within that State. There was no pretense, even, that the Continental Congress could step into the State and levy the forces or raise the money.

"There is even less of a pretense here in the proposed league of such power, right, or purposes. There are, as under the old Articles of Confederation there were, moral obligations involved, which are, as President Wilson said, 'more sacred than legal obligations'; higher, simply because they are not enforceable but are heard and passed upon by us as though we were a court of honor. When a question is in that court, and is acknowledged by individual or nation to be the kind of question that is rightfully there, it ceases to be debatable even. True, each individual or nation must decide for itself whether, under the circumstances of a given case, honor, and obligation in honor, be involved, whether the prescribed occasion to invoke the obligation has arisen. This is necessary as a check upon abuse of the authority of the league or world congress, though in this case, as with the Continental Congress, the difficulty of overassertion of authority will, I dare predict, not be found; but rather the opposite, hesitation to assert even such authority as might be rightfully invoked. I do not fear that the United States will ever fail to heed the voice of honor when just obligation to act under the league covenant is involved. 'But,' you say, 'the league may involve us in war.' Yes; in war to prevent war, i. e., to punish outlaw nations making offensive wars after failing or refusing to arbitrate differences, as Austria, under Germany's lead, did in the case of Serbia, or walking over the defenseless body of a weak nation in violation of plain treaty obligations, as Germany did in the case of Belgium. In no case can it involve us in aggressive or offensive war on the side of the aggressor, nor will we be involved in many, if any, wars against aggressors, for the simple reason that with the league and with us in it, as we will be, the would-be aggressor will be afraid to resort to war. A community agreement—which is all a municipal law is, even though a sanction be behind it—a community agreement expressed in law against theft or trespass or murder does not prevent every possible theft, trespass, or murder, but you do not refuse for that reason to enact laws against them. Why? Because, first, it does make a criminal of the trespasser, thief, or murderer, and that branding alone prevents more crimes than can or does the fear of punishment or of the police; and secondly, because it makes of the punishment visited on the criminal not a thing of private vengeance but a thing of sacred, solemn, and awful moral and social condemnation—a sentence.

"That is precisely what will happen concerning international crimes under the league—it will point out the criminal nations—those who choose to walk 'outside the pale of the law' of nations—will brand and ostracize them, as a municipal community brands and ostracizes its criminals; and, moreover, the league can and will, when made necessary, summon a criminal nation before it, as before a jury of its peers, there to be fairly tried and acquitted or convicted, and if convicted, to receive the solemn and awful sentence of the civilized world's condemnation, and even the world's ostracism, if sentence of ostracism be necessary to bring the outlaw nation to its senses. What is an outlaw nation thus summonable? One which makes war without first submitting or consenting to submit its quarrel or cause of offense to arbitration or to inquiry. That is the answer to that question, in short meter, when divested of the mouthings of lawyerlings and demagogues.

"The league is also a solemn international jury—not Government nor even a court when vivaciously analyzed—but an international jury of equal sovereigns to sit in judgment when the rights of their peers—other equal sovereigns—are involved, a jury sworn to decide according to the law and evidence and 'the very right' of each controversy, or sometimes, in nonjusticiable cases, merely to inquire and recommend or advise, taking nine months in all for 'cooling time' and for the operation of the moral sense or public opinion of the civilized world on the inflamed or greedy controversialist, giving opportunity for guidance by world reason rather than by tribal hate and passion. The league can not sit in judgment in any case, unless a nation has refused to submit to arbitration or inquiry. Remember that. Also remember that the United States have now more than a dozen arbitrative treaties. If there be any 'surrender of sovereignty' involved in agreeing beforehand to submit to arbitration we have already 'surrendered' it in those treaties, unless we signed without intent to observe. Ex-President Taft in this connection has well said:

> "The very fact that the machinery for settlement of disputes—the international jury—is there, to be appealed to by the weak when threatened with 'external aggression' by the strong, will prevent hundreds of wars—nearly if not all wars—just as the potentiality of a jury, with power to announce the moral condemnation of the community, prevents hundreds and thousands of crimes being undertaken or even seriously thought of to every one actually committed.

"'The league will involve us in war!' God save the mark! First, its very object and aim is to prevent all nations from settling disputes by wars. Will an honest attempt, an earnest try, a serious international entente to prevent a thing cause that very thing to occur? Is that the getting out place of lawless minds? I say lawless minds because every man and every class of men and every nation refusing settlement of controversy by court of arbitration or inquiry, asserting a so-called 'sovereign' right to be sole judge in his or its own quarrel is possessed of a 'lawless mind.' It is an attempted concealment of purposes of arrogance and despotism and will to dominate, of self-sufficiency and unrestrained 'pride in might,' under the thin veil of so-called personal or class or national 'sovereignty.' A free-will limitation set beforehand by yourself on the exercise of your own freedom of action is not a surrender of your independence or sovereignty, but is an assertion of both. If two of you agree never to throw another card or take another drink that is an assertion of your own free will in the form of an agreement and is a free-will limitation in the court of honor set by you yourself in its exercise, but is not a surrender of it or of your 'independence' to the other fellow.

"'Involve us in a war.' Great Heavens, haven't we always been, without a league, involved by necessity in other people's wars? We want to prevent the recurrence of their wars in order to stop the recurrence of our involvements in them. What were our hostilities with France without any declaration of war in the last years of the eighteenth century, and what was our actual declaration and waging of war against Great Britain in 1812 but our unavoidable involvement in the quarrels between England and France and between Napoleon and the Continent of Europe? What was our Spanish-American War but our natural, necessary, and unavoidable entanglement in the war between Cuba and Spain?

"What is chargeable with our belated participation in the late World War except unavoidable involvement of the neutral rights of our citizens growing out of a quarrel originally far from being ours? Suppose there had been a league of nations to make Austria and Serbia arbitrate, as Serbia and Earl Grey for Great Britain proposed, or if Austria had refused to ostracize her from traffic and travel with the rest of the world. There would have been no war.

"In the present state of the world's intercourse by steam, air, wireless, in commerce and travel, and, above and beyond all, in world thought, no great nation with vast interests can ever again be unaffected by a great war, nor if the war endure long can it remain ultimately undrawn into it. No great nation can or will ever again be and remain neutral, 'blowing neither hot nor cold,' and remaining nonparticipant, in any war long enduring between other great nations.

"The only way to avoid involvement is by preconcert of the free and civilized nations to avoid the wars themselves.

"Now and then a fool says, "Let Europe fight all it pleases; let us stay at home and attend to our own business.' But they won't let us 'attend to our own business,' and we simply can't 'stay at home.' They are in death grapple and can not, if they would let us, unhampered by war conditions, 'attend to our own business.' Their life is at stake and our 'business' must unavoidably be wrested from the even tenor of its way and be bent to conflicting war needs and war measures.

"Will you rather drift into war involvements like a set of unforeseeing and unvisioned asses, 'trusting to luck,' which means 'trusting to the devil,' and forgetting God who gave you a reason wherewith to provide against foreseen calamities? Or will you rather, in love of God and of men, and of man's work as the instrument of God's will on earth, use your reason, your 'common sense and common conscience' in providing beforehand in consensus with the other free peoples of the earth, possessing as much reason and common sense and common conscience as you and an equal love of peace, against the contingencies, which you know, unless you are fools, must again recur and must again bring armaments and wars, and must again involve your treasures and your sons?

"As for me and my household, we have heard the voices of the angels of the advent, announcing with sweet promise, 'Peace on earth to men of good will.' We have chosen. We shall worship rather the dear God 'who loveth us and made and loveth all' than the devils of discord, international suspicion, distrust, pride-swollen arrogance, and so-called 'sovereignty' and 'independence,' meaning by the words only independence of the moral sense of all other men and nations and an assertion of a sovereign right to do wrong.

"As for me and mine we shall worship the God of Justice which 'endureth forever' and is 'mighty' in the end 'to prevail,' and do our little best to discrown and dethrone the so-called 'God of Battles,' who never yet controlled the issue of a battle but cynically left it, as Bismarck once said, not to the forces of justice, liberty, equality, and fraternity, but to those 'of infantry, artillery, and cavalry.' No wonder, because like Baal, such a god is nonexistent. Let others believe as they will, I look to the gradual coming of a 'parliament of man and a federation of the world,' where 'the common sense of most shall hold fretful realms in awe.'

"I do not believe that men individually, or as nations, must always be what men always have been. If this were true, they would all be savages now, because all once were.

"But some one says, 'If we go in we can not get out.'

"Some Republican reminded us southerners in the Senate that we once went into a Union—which many called a 'compact'—and thought we could get out when we chose, but when we tried were coerced to stay. What a dishonest pretense of parallel. In this league the right to withdraw on a two years' notice, at discretion, with good reason or bad reason or none at all, provided only we comply with obligations theretofore incurred by us, is expressly stipulated and not merely thought to be 'reserved,' as was our view under the Federal Constitution. The difference is too plain for argument.

"If any amendment, in our opinion vital to our national life or freedom or sovereignty or independence, is proposed by us to the league and not adopted, we can exercise our express right of withdrawal. Indeed, when we propose the amendment, we may, if we choose, at the same time give the notice that we will withdraw if it be not adopted. I say this only in answer to the captious critic. As for me, I want us to go in and stay in, and lead the league and the world as we well may. If God has on this earth any greater instrumentality to work His will as the Lord of Love and Peace than this Republic, I do not know where to find it. But it must work its will in unison with His will and in love for His other children and with trust in them.

"I do not want us ever to withdraw, but through our membership I want us to shape things. My objection to the league is that it ought to have more teeth in it. But 'the American people care more and are thinking more about their stomachs than they care or are thinking about the heart of the world.' So said a cynic in answer to the President's remark that the failure of the league would 'break the heart of the world.'

"I don't believe it; but if true, then the American people deserve the contempt of all men and the damnation of God. The more you think of that utterance the greater your contempt for its author and the greater your resentment, because it is a vile slander and calumny of a great people of broad and tested humanity. If this slander be deserved, we were hypocrites when we entered the war, hypocrites when we fought it, and fit for hell now. But 'you can not change human nature, and men will fight and make wars.'

"'You can not change human nature,' eh! You can change your own 'human nature.' Every man who has been half educated and has become mentally and morally 'grown up' has changed his.

"Man is 'new born every day' with every sunrise. You Memphians read over again dear Walter Malone's poem 'Opportunity' as an incomparable and eloquent answer to all such stupidity.

"Humanity has been doing little else since it emerged from savagery and cave dwelling, except changing its nature. The 'common sense of most,' if there be instrumentalities for voicing it, can and daily does change what you call 'human nature'; that is, it changes the purposes, the ideals, the habits, the methods of thought, and the ways of living of nearly all men, indeed of all men except brutes and fools. Every step in human progress has been founded on the extinction or modification of something men then called 'human nature,' and has been accompanied or followed by the birth of something new as a part of what men afterwards called 'human nature.'

"If wise and good men had proceeded on the idea that what you call 'human nature,' which here means merely the subjectivity and moral consciousness of man, was a thing unchangeable, as the foolish kings of the Medes and Persians thought their laws were, then every at-any-time prevalent vice would have failed of extinction or even decrease, and no new virtues or ideals or religions or moral purpose would ever have been born into the world. There would have been no 'conversion,' no turning with other men toward better things, which is all conversion means. I am not a Roman Catholic; am on the contrary the furthest possible remove from it, a member of that church which under Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth checked and held it in its threatened reconquest of Europe, but I love sound opinion, whencesoever it come, and here is some of the soundest and best expressed from the present Pope:

"'What especially among other nations calls for such association of nations is the need all recognize of making every effort to abolish or reduce the enormous burden of the military expenditure, which states can no longer bear, in order to prevent these disastrous wars or at least to remove the danger of them as far as possible. So would each nation be assured not only of its independence but also of the integrity of its territory within its just borders.'

"That is his view of the essence of article 10, so berated and misrepresented in the last campaign.

"Now, hear the comment on it by one of the best, sweetest men I ever knew, Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore; after hearing these sentences the cardinal exclaimed:

"'Noble words. The holy father was indeed inspired with the spirit of righteousness when he proclaimed them to the everlasting city and to the world that is in such grave danger. I subscribe to them absolutely, and without reserve, as an American citizen and as a son of the church, as well-nigh the eldest son of the church.'

* * * * * * * *

"Do you recall how it (meaning the war) came? There were a few letters from foreign ministers, half published, or not at all, a few telegrams exchanged between emperors and kings, and then rivers of blood began to flow to the Niagara of suffering, at which we, dumbfounded and almost helpless, still assist.

"What I most like and highly value about the proposed league is first the delay which it imposes upon any and all nations. You must not rush headlong into this thing in which we all run the danger of being involved. We say you must be frank, open and aboveboard, you must place your plans before the world, and they must and shall be carefully weighed. Why, in my judgment, this single, New World regulation will reduce wars to a minimum. Second thought and careful consideration of steps to be undertaken is imposed, and on sober second thought few will draw the sword.

"And then I like and value that phrase and declaration, 'that it is the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstances whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.'

THE FRIENDLY RIGHT.

"'It shall be the friendly right—I like that immensely,'" continued his eminence. 'In the next decade—better in the next 10 months—I hope it will become the friendly right and the inevitable duty for all nations to combine for the preservation of peace. How often would wars have been avoided if in the past we had acted in this way and under these prescriptions. * * *

"'I like the plan for delay. I like the solemn agreement for the prevention of international war which the covenant stands for, and of which, in the words you have just read, his holiness, the pope, expressed his warm approval. So with the great disaster behind us, although we still sit in its dark shadow, we should be, and I believe we are, determined to safeguard the order of human society which is in danger to maintain the independence of the peoples within their just borders, and to reduce if we can not wholly abolish the burden of military expenditure. Sitting as a council of brethren within the shadow of the great catastrophe still upon us, we should, and I have no doubt we will, draw nearer to one another and take up in a fraternal spirit seriatim those vexed questions that still remain and which are a grave menace to the fellowship of the forward-looking, God-fearing, God-loving nations.' * * *

"In conclusion, one thing is certain, you can never bring any good or ideal or great thing into consummation or participate in its bringing about if you just cry out 'non possumus,' and don't try; nor can you without trying be worthy of instrumentality in the consummation of any great thing. If you are that sort of human dry stubble the sooner you are burnt off the earth and cease to cumber it, the better.

"Nothing can be greater than this thing we are now trying to bring about—'Peace on earth to men of good will'—a thing visioned by seers, foretold by prophets, sung by poets, and announced in sweet promise by angels." (The angels of the advent of the "Prince of Peace.")

(Being a lecture upon "International nagging," unanimous consent to print which was obtained by Senator WILLIAMS upon June 20, 1922, to follow lecture No. 1.)

"You will observe, although I have mentioned neither, that thus far nearly all I have said is pertinent to article 10 and to articles 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 of the league, the former being the outline guaranteeing the independence and sovereignty and territorial integrity of each member of the league, against 'external aggression,' the others proposing the machinery for arbitration and inquiry to take the place of war, where possible, in the present state of world opinion and formulating the means of invoking and enforcing the operation of the machinery thus provided.

"Ask the librarian for the league and read article 10 and articles 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17. These constitute, with the preamble, the gist of the covenant. There is more of good in this great instrument—good as these are—but not so essential. Skip in reading to A on page 3. Read article 8, constituted for the purposes of disarmament by future actions of the league. Read article 2, pregnant with the promise of finding an adjustment of all controversies not of a domestic character 'which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.'

"Domestic questions are excluded from the jurisdiction and operation of the league. First, by the description of questions over which jurisdiction is conferred in language guarded by 'the careful pen' of ex-Senator Elihu Root, approved by the President, and adopted at Versailles.

"Read articles 18, 19, and 20, substituting open for secret diplomacy.

"I pass over article 21, because it deals with the Monroe doctrine, to which I will come later.

"Read article 22, substituting government by mandate of the league and through the instrumentality of mandatories for the old species of government of conquered territories by arbitrary will of the conquerors. It applies in the case of countries settled by uncivilized people or people whose hostile environment is such that they must be protected while gathering strength to stand alone and learning to walk.

"Read the clause for the organization, under the league's sanction, of a permanent court of international justice to settle justiciable questions. Remember that Elihu Root represented the United States on the commission which framed the organization of the court and that it has already been framed and accepted except in one particular, where the council thought this stickler for American sovereignty had gone too far the other way and surrendered the sovereignty of all nations to compulsory process by the court, when it was intended only that submission of questions to the court should be a voluntary submission. What, in view of that, do you think of these children in contemporary international lore who say 'the league is scrapped'?

"With this great new international fact already accomplished staring them in the face, they are childish enough to expect you to believe that. The permanent commission on disarmament has begun to work. Remember that, too, and remember that its work will be all the easier because Germany, the great offender, has already been nearly disarmed. The league is what commercial men call 'a going concern.'

"With or without the membership of this great Republic, it is going to go on as a 'going concern.' The question for you and me is not 'shall the league agreed on at Versailles be created.' It is already created, constituted, and is working—though, of course, by no means working as well with us out as it would have worked with us in. It has, however, prevented one war and stopped another after hostilities had begun and blood had been shed—a difficult thing. What might it not have done with our great disinterested, unselfish, moral influence in it and behind it? It is helping, though not with complete efficaciousness, to stabilize Europe and Asia financially and economically, and what might it not have effectuated with our help as an active associate? It has a clause submitting to a commission the formulation of the 'laws of the sea' to protect the 'freedom of the seas' in so far as may be, under modern conditions. That commission has begun work.

"Now, I come to that part of my topic concerning the peace of the world where interracial and international 'nagging' cuts a figure. There is nothing more dangerous to the peace of the world or the welfare of America than permitting our course in foreign affairs, our international policies, to be controlled or even influenced by those of our hyphenates—whether German-Americans, Irish-Americans, or Italian-Americans—who continue to hold with their traditionary and hereditary European patriotisms and hatreds based chiefly, even in Europe, on mutual ignorance of one another. As for those of foreign birth or parentage who do not continue to hold with these things, they are as good Americans as you or I. But in our foreign relations, at any rate, the voice of no man should be heeded, or even heard, or so much as tolerated, unless he speak simply and solely as an American 'unembroidered, unfrilled, and unismed.' If anything else pertaining to anything European motivate him; if trans-Atlantic love or hate, for church or state, transcend or even rival in his affection or purpose the welfare, happiness, progress, culture, or peace of these United States, then, his affection or purpose, much more the voicing of them, is that of an enemy to our welfare and that of a conscious or unconscious traitor to our State. We do not ask him to give up his affection or purpose, his alien tradition or interest, but we do ask and have a right to ask him if he can not sincerely and wholly subordinate them in affection and purpose to the ideals, interests, or policies of this people, to go back to the land he loves and whence he came, there to serve it; or if he wants to fight somebody over there to go back and on his own soil help his own people there manfully to fight the real or fancied enemy nation whom he hates more than he loves us. We want no spies in our household who would use their place here to make us their tools to advance rival or enemy households in satisfaction of a foreign moral allegiance, or who, worse still, would in satisfaction of some alien hatred have us retard, antagonize, and maybe fight other and to us friendly households. Such a man is for us a traitor and an enemy. What we ask is not asking much. It is only saying what Uncle Toby said when he opened the window to let the imprisoned fly escape: 'Go, poor thing; the world is big enough for you and me.' The fly had sense enough to go; nor is there any record that it was angered by the injunction.

"Men who have come to our shores to advantage themselves, especially if they have succeeded, have no right to use their asylum privileges as a means of disadvantaging us. They have the right to hate or to love whom they please but not to use this Republic in its foreign relations as a base fulcrum for the exercise of the lever of gratification of either passion.

"Shall you allow them to boast that Americans no longer govern America? Above all, are our sacred aspirations toward the peace of the world to be disappointed and the fair structure of the temple of the League of Nations to be laid low by these miserable European wrangles transplanted to America by those to whom we have given liberty, opportunity, and in many cases fortune? Is the temple to be torn down by so-called Italian-Americans because Woodrow Wilson could not see his way in justice clear to give the Italians Fiume, the only spacious Adriatic seaport for ten or twelve millions of Yugo-Slavs—a port so clearly not Italian that the Italians engaged in the secret treaty of London to give it to Croatia, now a part of Yugoslavia? Are these Yugo-Slavs to be nagged into war, into which the world might be drawn, by so-called Americans here cooperating with a crazy poet and a purposely inflamed Italian populace in Europe? Are we to be deflected from a league with our recent war associates to keep the peace of the world, because some, I hope not all—not even many—so-called German-Americans can register by secret ballot a protest of hate against us because we dared to help humble in the dust an arrogant Kaiser and his insolent Junkerthum? Are we to be twisted from a wise and world-loving and world-trusting foreign policy, because a lot of so-called Irish-Americans want us to take part in a brawl in Ireland between the Seinn Fein on the one side and the Dublin police and Irish constabulary and the men of Ulster on the other side, with none of whom have we, as Americans, part or parcel? We had a civil war in America once, and the people of 11 States fought with trained armies a civilized war, valorously, for 'self-determination,' a cause I imagine at least as sacred in America as in Ireland. What southerner expected Ireland to help secure it for us? What northerner would not have resented the intervention of either Ireland or England?

"Yet here are so-called Irish-Americans trying to defeat the covenant for peace because they hate Britain, and simply because Britain, our recent war associate, is a party to it. They say it will prevent the armed intervention of this Republic in behalf of the independence of Ireland. Suppose it did; that is a question to be decided by Americans and not by Irishmen here or abroad, and to be decided solely with the welfare of America in view. As a matter of fact, however, in respect to civil wars, the league leaves us and every other member just where we were before it was formed, just where we are now, with whatever our rights and duties as a member of the society of civilized nations are or may be. The league looks only to the prevention of wars of aggression between nations, and has no word, nor pretense of word, about preventing civil wars, unless, indeed, they grow to proportions such that in the language of article 11 they 'threaten the peace of the world.' If so, then the league, and each nation under it, has certain acknowledged and asserted rights under article 11 never before internationally recognized. It is needless to say that the civil war now going on, less between England and Ireland than between Irishmen of different races and religions in Ireland, has reached no such proportions.

"Even our great war between the States, involving 3,000,000 of soldiers and four years of time, never, in the judgment of European nations, reached the proportion where their intervention was justified on the ground that it 'threatened the peace of the world.' Let genuine Americans of Irish descent read and ponder on Article II. Such Irish-Americans as hold America in their heads and hearts first, above all countries, even Ireland, and above their hatred of Great Britain, which is, I fear, with some of them stronger than their love for Ireland, are near our hearts and beloved and cherished by all. Such German-Americans, or genuine Americans of German descent, as put America above the Kaiser and Germany even, and such genuine Americans of Italian descent as put America first and above Italian conquest of Fiume even, are cherished, respected, trusted, and loved by us here. But we want no ceaseless 'nagging' of other nations and peoples by pretended Americans, thereby endangering the peace of the world and perhaps of America, whether it be German nagging of France or Italian nagging of Yugoslavia or Irish nagging of England, Scotland, and Wales. Genuine Americans—unembroidered, unfrilled, un-ismed, and unhyphenated—regardless of the place of their European derivation, who put America and its peace and its influence for the peace of the world above all petty European squabbles and European traditional and racial hates, will ultimately govern America. Never fear on that score—however strong be open enemies abroad or more or less concealed enemies at home, or however unpromising any recent occurrences, in elections or otherwise, may seem.

"Let us look at world relations as Americans, disinterested—'with charity to all and malice to none'—knowing that within certain broad racial demarcation lines of black and white and red and yellow and brown, human nature is very much the same all over the world, and that we are not much worse nor much better here on the Mississippi than other white men on the Thames, the Rhine, the Danube, the Seine, or the Tiber.

"Let us look at it as the Swiss did, solely from these two standpoints—the welfare of the world and the welfare of Switzerland. I wish you would all read how calmly the Swiss argued it all out without 'nagging' one another, though the Swiss are linguistically and racially German in one part, French in another, and Italian in a third. Contrast their cool, unimpassioned world-spirit way of arguing the pros and cons of entering the league, especially of being bound by article 10, with our partisan, racial, parochial way of discussing the same question. If article 10 threatens our 'sovereignty' or 'independence,' it is an equal threat to Switzerland in this regard. But the Swiss coolly asked 'Is it?' and coolly answered, all of them, whether they answered in German, French, or Italian, 'No.'

"'Independence' and 'sovereignty' are to Switzerland as precious as to us. She has enjoyed them longer. They are not only as precious, but for her they are more easily endangered, first, because she is a little country and has Germany bounding her on the north, France on the west, Austria on the east, and Italy, as well as France, on the south; and, secondly, because, while the Swiss are one nation and an old, patriotic, liberty-loving democratic nation, they are not one people, but are three peoples.

"The Swiss asked themselves not only what would be their condition in the league but what outside of it. Also, they considered the world as well as Switzerland. Listen to this; no parish squabbles here:

"'If it is concern for the welfare of our country which must guide our decision, we must nevertheless not confine ourselves to its immediate interests. We must endeavor to judge the question from a higher point of view than that of narrow and exclusive national interest.'

"How coolly and how tersely they analyzed the peace purpose of the league without prejudice, without exaggeration of its scope. Listen to this, all in a nutshell; to contrast it with our method is to shame us:

"'The fundamental idea of the Paris covenant is that certain kinds of war must be prohibited and that the State which violates this prohibition is the enemy of all members of the League of Nations and must be combated by all. War itself as an extreme method of safeguarding the interests of the State is not prohibited. For the League of Nations, as its founders have deemed it possible to organize it, is not able to assure a complete protection of those interests. The only wars prohibited are those which are regarded as particularly dangerous to the general peace; that is, wars of surprise, or wars of aggression, and wars declared against a State which complies with an arbitral sentence or an opinion given unanimously by the council.

"'In a number of cases it is difficult to settle whether it is for a just or an unjust cause a State desires to go to war. It is not this criterion, therefore, which the covenant of the League of Nations adopts. Its provisions are based upon an objective and very important fact—recourse, before the opening of hostilities, to a procedure of arbitration or mediation and also the observance of the delays of that procedure.

* * * * * * *

"'Whether a difference is susceptible of causing a rupture can not be determined in advance. But before entering upon war every State must observe the procedure made obligatory by article 12; it must have recourse to it as soon as a conflict takes a turn likely to lead to a "rupture," by which war is not necessarily meant, but the sudden cessation of negotiations. It is of the utmost importance that differences should be smoothed out as quickly as possible by a pacific procedure, and not only when they attain a degree of acuteness in which the possibility of war must be seriously taken into consideration.

* * * * * * *

"'If unanimity is not obtained the parties enjoy complete freedom of action after the expiration of the period of three months; they may therefore go to war.

* * * * * * *

"'The clause "the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report" means that in such a case military intervention is excluded against any State; that is, against each of the various parties interested in the dispute and without considering which has originally been the plaintiff.'

"Note the terseness, conciseness, and fairness of their analysis of article 10 in contrast with the ghost-raising methods adopted by its opponents here, and alas sometimes the self-stultifying methods of its advocates here:

ARTICLE 10.

"'Article 10 of the Paris covenant in particular has given rise to fears. It declares that the members of the League of Nations undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression—that is to say, against any sudden attack—their territorial integrity and their "existing political independence." To determine the meaning of this article it is necessary, in our opinion, to keep the following facts especially in mind:

"'a. The members of the League of Nations engage to protect the territorial integrity of the States only against aggression. They do not guarantee it against any modification. The possibility of modifying the present status quo is foreseen, at least in principle, by article 19. An allusion to this has been made in the declarations of several influential authors of the covenant.

"'b. This article contemplates only external aggression; that is to say, originating in other States, and not civil wars, which involve social troubles or the attempt to establish the political autonomy of certain territories. The League of Nations is distinguished from the Holy Alliance and from the legitimist pentarchy of 1815 in that it contains nothing in the nature of a mutual insurance for governments.

"'c. * * * It is not the degree of independence existing in 1919—full sovereignty, autonomy, etc.—which is protected, but the state of things which shall exist in law at the moment of the unjust aggression.

"'d. The council, according to this article, may only give counsel (advice) and not direct orders. Likewise, general sanctions as prescribed in article 16 are in no wise brought into question here; recourse may be had to them only when articles 12, 13, or 15 are violated. * * *

"'To get the exact sense of this article it must be considered with other provisions intended to assure the maintenance of peace. By the general rules of interpretation it follows from such an examination that the obligations prescribed by article 16 for the case of collective action by the League of Nations exist only in the eventualities expressly enumerated in that article itself. They can not be extended to other measures which might be decreed by the league and in particular not to the case of its intervention to assure the maintenance of the territorial and political status quo. In our opinion the conclusion must be that the league States are bound to abstain from any violent enterprise, but that they can not be compelled in all cases to defend the State attacked in the manner foreseen by article 16.

DIRECTED AGAINST WARS OF CONQUEST.

"'It can, however, be conceived that the League of Nations might wish to protect the territory and independence of its members not only against the aggressions prohibited by articles 12–15 but also against any other attempt against it. Nevertheless, since all war—even a war tolerated by the covenant—implies by definition an attack directed against the enemy territory, an enterprise of this kind could not obviously imply violation of article 10 in all cases. There would be a collision only if a belligerent refused to arbitrate or submit to inquiry, evacuate an occupied territory, or if at the outset it manifested a desire to make a war of conquest. For the consequences of this fact are not at all those which article 16 attaches to wars of surprise. The council will confine itself to making recommendations destined to assure the territorial maintenance of the status quo. The council may formulate obligatory advice unanimously only, and solely for its own members and for the other States invited in the specific instance to be represented on the council (art. 4, par. 5). There is, therefore, no reason for admitting that this provision must involve very heavy obligations for the members of the League of Nations. * * *

"'Finally, the covenant in no respect shows the tendency of perpetuating in all cases the existing international situations upon which territorial frontiers are based. On the contrary, article 19 foresees the possibility of modifications in the existing state of things brought about in the interest of peace. To subscribe to the covenant and thereby to accept article 10 amounts not to giving an implicit approval to the present territorial division but only to admitting the principle that the status quo may not be modified by violence.

* * * * * * *

"'Article 16 expressly mentions articles 12, 13, and 15. It is not possible to apply it to violations of other provisions of the covenant.'

"And it certainly can not be invoked in aid of article 10. Remember that. Note the general summary of the expected working result of the covenant:

MORAL PROGRESS MADE.

"Yet great progress must be seen in the fact that all States—and particularly all the great States whose effective aid is indispensable to combat war—engage not only to renounce war except under certain conditions, but to regard any State as an enemy which attacks another or which flouts an opinion given unanimously by the League of Nations. This is also moral progress, because this fact substitutes for the heretofore dominant principle of the egoism of the State—each for itself—the new idea of international solidarity—all for one.

"This solidarity respecting any disturber of the peace implies obligations for the league States infinitely more important than the restriction of their right to make war. The application of sanctions provided by the pact affects all these States, even the most pacific, and does so in a manner which may impose upon them the heaviest sacrifices. * * * If the covenant went further, it would result in restricting the independence of States, a condition before which, mayhap, the very ones who to-day criticize the weakness of the league would recoil most strenuously. To reach any political result it is necessary to take account of what is practically realizable at a given moment.

"In addition to articles 12, 15, 16, and 17, which impose even on States not in the League of Nations very definite restrictions on the right to make war, the covenant contains a series of other provisions destined to assure the maintenance of peace. They concern the limitation and control of armaments, article 9; the mutual guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence, article 10; the right of the League of Nations to consider any fact of a nature to jeopardize peace, articles 11 and 19. But in all these cases the question is one of general guidance in matters of policy and not of determined duties imposed upon the States. The efficiency of these provisions depends essentially upon the authority which the League of Nations may have.

"The requirement of unanimity of the council prevents any exercise of its power which might threaten the independence or safety of any State. Note that fact in immediate connection with the above.

"As I said, the Swiss considered their prospective status if Switzerland stayed out. It behooves us to know how coolly and clearly they reasoned from that standpoint. We must reason from it, too. Our status would be like in kind to theirs, though different in degree, because we are stronger and are further away from Europe, though by no means separated from it; rather united to it—by the sea. Here are some of the things they found:

"Article 17 of the covenant permits the league to impose the observance of articles 12–15 upon the States which are not of the league. The international community must have the right of demanding from all States recourse to the pacific procedure provided for the regulation of disputes.

"In other words, the league will make us arbitrate or submit to inquiry before going to war with any of its members, whether we will or not, even though ourselves not a member. Either that or we must fight the civilized world in defense of a fancied right of ours, which no nation under God really has, or ever had, viz, the right to make war when and how we please—'sovereignty' pleases, if you please. They also found the following consequences of not participating:

"'Finally, it must be asked what would happen to Switzerland if she remained outside the League of Nations—that is, if she wished in principle to maintain economic relations with both the parties at loggerheads? She would find herself on one side faced by covenant-breaking State or States which, being blockaded by the rest of the world, would probably not be in condition to provide her with what is indispensable to her. The League of Nations would in all probability, and economically at least, be the stronger and more apt to be self-supporting. For, by the tenor of article 16, States members of the league would be bound to prevent, especially on their own territory, but also probably in the theater of maritime war, all economic and other relations between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and every other person. States would, therefore, place their relations with a neutral State under rigid conditions, even if—and this has already been attempted in the course of the late war—they did not aim at subordinating the maintenance of these relations to a certain regulation of the relations of the neutral with the covenant-breaking State.

"'The League of Nations would devote all the greater energy to assure through the neutral State the efficiency of the blockade directed against its adversary, because it would believe that by doing this it would safeguard not only the interests of certain specific States but those of humanity at large. It may consequently be forecast that from the economic point of view the league would not show any particular good will toward a State refusing to associate itself for these great world-peace purposes.'

* * * * * * *

"Further:

"'But it must be understood that if we stay outside the League of Nations our political isolation will make the establishment of our foreign commerce on stable and advantageous foundations very difficult. Several States to-day, and doubtless for some time yet, are disposed to alter their commercial policy in the direction of protectionism. It is also possible that the States united by the war would mutually favor each other in the field of commercial relations. In any case, a State which after being invited to join the League of Nations preferred not to adhere to it will, as a general rule, find itself in a situation less favorable for the conclusion of treaties of commerce than if, by the mediation of the league, it had entered into closer relations with its members. At a time when questions of sentiment have a very considerable influence on policy, these imponderabilia can no longer be neglected in the solution of economic problems.'

"The Swiss considered the 'regional understanding' clause of the league and found perfectly plain what the Senate coterie pretended to be unable to understand. Note what they say:

"'But, on the other hand, article 21 of the covenant allowed the giving of recognition to the fact that neutrality is an engagement for safeguarding the state of peace. This article declares that such engagements are not incompatible with any provisions of the covenant. It cites as examples "treaties of arbitration and regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine,"'

* * * * * * *

"Further:

"'The expression "regional understandings" may be variously understood. It may be conceived that neighbor States form within the League of Nations something like close communities for developing more completely the principles of the League of Nations. The Pan American Union would be an organism of this kind.

"'Treaties of obligatory arbitration are in no wise contrary to the League of Nations, for nothing in it is opposed to States engaging to settle their differences by the judicial method. In this condition it is proper to observe that The Hague convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes is always in force.'

"I wish each of you could and would read 'The Message of the Federal Council of Switzerland' advising accession to the league, and this 'commentary' accompanying the message, from which I have just been quoting and have quoted already enough for an address of this length.

"Suppose we stay out; let us inquire further how it will affect us in our international relations, and especially with regard to the Monroe doctrine. Are we less entangled and is the Monroe doctrine safer with us in the league or with us outside of it?

"First, although the league exists and is working much good and promising still more, it can not work perfectly until not only we but Germany and Russia are members of it. Until then it is not a world league in the broadest sense, and though it has now the strength to secure its will for peace against either Germany or Russia or even against us, and that, too, probably without war but by mere threat of commercial ostracism, it could not secure it against all three of these outside powers, if united in alliance against it. Do we love so-called 'sovereignty' enough to be thrown into that sort of antagonistic alliance, even if Mexico were added to our friends and even though the cause were the 'sacred cause' of making war when 'in our sovereign right' we chose? On the other side would stand an alliance for peace between virtually all the peoples of the earth, except Mexico, which is negligible, Russia, which as yet has no government but only anarchy, and our late enemies, who are knocking at the door of the league for admission but are temporarily denied entry until they can show stability of institutions sufficient to meet their international obligations.

"Germany has been promised admission as soon as she shows bona fide effort for the performance of her obligations under the treaty. She should be admitted as soon as can be, consonantly with the safety of the treaty. We ought to be represented in the council and the assembly when the question of her right to be admitted comes on for a hearing. Sixty millions of the Teutonic race in the heart of Europe can not be permanently debarred from any world institution or world concert without manifest danger of injustice and without constant menace to the new-found peace of the world. We love the French, and owe them much for recent heroic service to civilization and liberty, and for her former services to us at the birth of our great Republic, but we can not permit France, either in hatred or in fear of Germany, or both, to bring the world into this final anachronism. Germany must first, of course, make a bona fide showing, but when she does we want to be there to join Great Britain in admitting her. This reason influenced Switzerland, too. Her Federal Council said:

"'The most important among the States which are not mentioned in the league as original members are, on the one hand, the so-called Central Powers (Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey), and on the other hand Russia. The momentary exclusion of the Central Powers, in particular, is of a nature to give to the league a special political character. With Russia these States comprise more than half of the population of Europe. Their admission into the league is of the greatest importance at least for Europe, since even after the conclusion of peace Europe will remain the principal arena of international differences, on account of the multiplicity of States which it includes and of their great social and economic diversity.'

"Read further and in your mind substitute United States for Switzerland:

"'By remaining for the time outside Switzerland would not hasten the admission of the States at present excluded, and if she entered the league with them her attitude would be interpreted not as a proof of independence but rather as an evidence of dependence upon those States. To apply tardily for admission under such conditions would manifestly be for Switzerland to renounce in the League of Nations a rôle corresponding to her international mission.'

"France with us out would fear to admit Germany; with us in, to counterbalance any bad faith that Germany might betray after joining—if she showed any—France would feel safer. Without us she thinks she can not always trust England, and knows she can not always trust Italy to stand by her and make her safe against any possible machinations or treachery of her hereditary antagonist, so superlatively her superior in production and wealth and war power even now. We should be there not sharing the hereditary hatred, jealousy, and distrust of either, and discouraging their mutual 'nagging.'

"If we even go in and Germany stays out it will not be a world league in any true sense, though it will be a virtual alliance with our late war associates and all the neutral powers—an alliance strong enough to maintain world peace and impose a reign of justice. But Germany is going in, and can not in ordinary international equity and justice be always or long held out.

"If Germany and we both stay out we shall be thrown nolens volens into alliance with one another against the already declared purpose of the existing league as now constituted, which is certainly not going to dissolve itself and quit its great purpose of enjoying and promoting world peace just to please us, or, rather, our Wilson-hating senatorial coterie, temporarily representing us as a constitutional part of our treaty-making power and temporarily supported by a popular majority.

"If we stay out, Germany may possibly, for that reason alone, stay out with us in order to bring about for her own purposes the very state of things above outlined, and with the hope of yet further dividing her late enemies and giving thereby future opportunity to pounce upon France in a war of revenge.

"Russia will be greedily admitted as soon as she has a stable government recognizing international obligations. Let us suppose another dilemma, to wit: If Russia and Germany both came in and we, being induced thereto by Irish fear and hatred of England and German hatred of Wilson and Italian fear and hatred of Yugoslavia, reenforced here by foreign-language newspapers, the yellow press, and demagogues, who think that the surest way to get and hold office is to remain out, then what do we face? Complete isolation. All the rest of the civilized world voluntarily within the pale of the international law of the new era, and we, Mexico, and the Sinn Fein Irish alone 'beyond the pale of the law' of nations!

"Substantially, we alone, because we could not look to Mexicans to do anything but fight one another, and could look to the Sinn Fein for no higher or more efficacious service than that which they, during the Great War, rendered to Germany and the Kaiser against us and our late war associates, the burning of a few barracks and British war-supply stores, or the rabbling in Cork of a few of our enemy's sailors, as they rabbled our sailors there, because we were then associates of England in the war against Germany.

"With Germany in and us out, what then becomes of the Monroe doctrine? Remember, the Republics of South America and some of those of Central America are already in. Remember that the Argentine and Brazil are ready, judging by the utterances of their press and public men, if reduced to a choice between our guaranty and the world's guaranty of South American territorial integrity, to accept the latter. Keep in mind, too, that the nations of the world, except in this very league, have never recognized our right to proclaim or enforce the Monroe doctrine, and that we have been able to maintain it in the past only by the fear that any one European nation always entertained of war with us, and their further well-grounded fear that the Monroe doctrine, born of British Canning's suggestion to President Monroe, and in strict accord with England's interests in America then and now, would receive the support of the British fleet and of the British-American colonial powers also allied by geographical propinquity to our views. Even this first world recognition of the doctrine contained in the league goes for naught, if the consideration for it fail, to wit, our membership in the league.

"Suppose us out and a dispute between us and some South or Central American power, a member of the league, should arise? What would be, indeed must be, the action of the league? On what ground of justice could England stand bound as she would then be and is now by the obligations and policy of the league? How could she continue her good offices for the Monroe doctrine? Could she hazard a vetoed action by the council of the league?

"Suppose a dispute between us and some European country—say, Germany, about the rights of Germans in Brazil, or, say, Italy, about the rights of the Italians in the Argentine? It would cease at once to be a controversy between us and any one European power. The intervention of the league and all its members would be invoked, and we would by our non-entry and consequent failure of consideration be powerless to appeal to the principle of the announced exclusion of the Monroe doctrine from the jurisdiction of the league. (Read articles 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17.) The question would go before the council—we without vote or voice there. It is, or might be, decided against us. The result—we either submit to the league's requirement of arbitration, if the question were justiciable, or of inquiry and delay, if not justiciable, and thus surrender our peculiar and independent American attitude toward the Monroe doctrine, no longer resting as heretofore on our ipse dixit and our own and England's interest and sea power and not resting hereafter, as it would rest if we had become members of the league, upon the recognition of it in the league by the civilized world as a thing making for peace, but a thing peculiar to us, a part of our American hegemony, enforcible alone by us and admittedly outside the jurisdiction and functioning of the league. Either in the supposed contingency we must nolens volens submit to the demand for arbitration or inquiry or embrace the alternative of taking up arms against the voice, perhaps the action of the civilized world—Europe and all the balance of America.

"Moreover we would be fighting apparently for the 'right' to be sole judge in our own controversy, and the so-called right to make war at will to enforce our decision in our own favor. Perhaps the council of the Sinn Fein Republic might pass resolutions of sympathy, if they thought that would emphasize the expression of their hatred of England. If England tried to help us, we would not have even that much countenance in the world.

"What I have pictured would be true even if Germany were still out of the league. It would be a fortiori true if she had meantime joined, because there would be with her more power in the league and less hesitation there about defying our Monroe doctrine and us. Germany has always wished the doctrine ill. Bismarck flouted it as 'a piece of international impertinence.' The German people and world merchants have ever so regarded it.

"Now, for another piece of nagging, growing out of the disposition of Shantung. The whole thing from its German incipiency to its Japanese conclusion, like everything else the world, except ourselves, has done in China, was high-handed and objectionable; but most of the criticism has been mere 'nagging,' with a view to votes, especially on the Pacific slope, and some of it, like the talk about 'sovereignty over 36,000 square miles and 38,000,000 souls' being 'at stake,' has been plain lying.

"The zone over which political sovereignty is ceded to Japan under the treaty—not the league—is a little over 100 square miles with a population of about 60,000 Chinese.

"We had made no objection when Germany took and occupied the country and forced a lease of a hundred years from China. This was under McKinley's administration. As one writer puts it, we announced in substance through Mr. Hay, our then Secretary of State, that 'as long as an open door for American merchandise was kept open and we were permitted to do business in the stolen territory, we were willing to let it be stolen.' At Versailles Japan wanted to take over the lease from China to Germany, of the country in China taken from Germany by Japan, the lease having then still 78 years of recognized life. Japan had spent money and men to dispossess Germany. France and England were freely, and China in the usual way, treaty bound to let her take that course. Japan was in possession and her plenipotentiaries ready to go home and arm to hold what she had and what Germany had had. We were not then and are not now willing to undertake to dispossess her by force. The President, after standing out to the verge of breach with England, France, and Japan, secured a compromise, whereby Japan secured the transfer of the German lease, but—mark ye the but—'but' the Japanese delegates agreed for Japan that she was to 'hand back the Shantung Peninsular in full sovereignty to China,' retaining only the economic privileges granted to Germany and the right to establish a settlement or free-trade treaty period under the usual conditions at Tsing-Tau, and not for herself alone but for the world. Japan will have an economic concession about railroads and mines, where Germany ruled as sovereign. Japan is one of the nations which keeps its word—scrupulously.

"But when Japan, after killing or capturing the German force of occupation, secured from China a recognition of the transfer of the lease, there being no Japanese-American voters, as there had been German-American voters to cater to, many found it 'a great outrage' and 'a tragedy.' But why all this so long deferred outcry? Plain 'nagging.' There was 'politics' in 'nagging' Japan, especially on the Pacific slope. Obviously one Democratic and one Republican Senator, besides several others in both Houses of Congress, would profit politically by it. There had been no politics—quite the opposite—in nagging Germany at the time she committed the original wrong. But 'on with the dance, let joy be unconfined'—on with the nagging. 'It will be the making of HIRAM JOHNSON' to paraphrase what Sut Lovingood said to his father about training 'the purp.'

"The treatment of China with regard to Shantung was wrong, but fair men will admit that it was here not a reason, but a mere pretense to oppose the treaty and then the league. These western politicians do not love Chinese any more than Japanese. If we, by the terms of the treaty, had got the German concession they would have defended it by much the same specious reasoning as they used in defending the seizure and retention of the Philippines when we stepped into Spain's shoes there, just as Japan wanted to step into Germany's shoes in Shantung.

"Now, for another piece of nagging. The Swiss Federal Council without passion and without prejudice coolly records that:

"'According to paragraph 2, countries which enjoy complete administrative autonomy without being sovereign may, on their own motion, be admitted as members of the League of Nations. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India now enter into calculation in this respect.'

"I will add that if Ireland gets complete 'administrative autonomy,' she, too, will be entitled to be represented in the assembly, though, like the others, not in the council of the league. England seems ready to grant her all except independence.

"Switzerland, like France and Italy and Japan and Norway and Holland and Spain, finds in this clause about the British dominions no wrong thing to make it advisable for the non-English speaking peoples to object to it or, on account of it, to stay out of the league. They all might reasonably have voiced objection, because our one vote and Great Britain's one vote in the council gives two votes to the Anglo-Saxon powers, and our one voice and her one voice and the four voices of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa in the assembly gives the Anglo-Saxon powers six voices, and in the few cases where votes are cast in the assembly six votes, there. All of this might have given continental Europe cause to pause for fear of Anglo-Saxon overpower, if not supremacy. They did not either object or pause. But when that information came to the United States Senate, its Members 'fairly howled.' Why? Because it would do us, or the world, or the peace of the world any harm? No. They knew it would not—quite the contrary. But because there was 'politics' in 'nagging' Great Britain. It was thought that the man or party that excelled in loud-mouthing this particular sort of nagging could get the Irish-American vote. They therefore nagged, and they got most of the vote they fished for.

"Is there one of my hearers who does not know that to be the causal fact of their objection, whether he approve or disapprove of the anti-British feeling appealed to?

"Instead of being glad to have the aid of the voices and votes in the assembly of these five administratively independent autonomies—all, except India, our racial kindred—and speaking our language, reading our literature, loving our race-won and race-prized liberties, living under virtually the same law, embracing similar ideals, cherishing even our anti-Japanese and anti-Chinese 'race prejudices,' as other people call it, or, as we call it, our determination to insure white supremacy in our own several countries; instead of being glad, I repeat, and therefore expressing our delight that these profoundly peace-loving peoples had a voice at least in the assembly, where they, with us, could stand for all these things thus held in common—instead of leaving France, Italy, Spain, Japan, and later Germany and Russia, 'to worry' about it if they chose—we, of all men, 'cried aloud' against it! A spectacle comical in every aspect, if it did not, as it does, threaten tragedy of woe of discord and possible fratricidal war in its remote consequence. I, for one, never hoped for a thing so fraught with peace promise, never hoped that the continent of Europe could ever be brought to include, even in the assembly of the league, these English-speaking elements outside of Europe and therefore, like us, disinterested and fair because nonparticipant in the suspicious and racial and religious distrusts and hatreds of the Old World.

"For my part, I wish it were possible for Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa to have votes in the council, as well as voices in the assembly. They would never vote with Great Britain except when Great Britain was right—certainly never against New World interests.

"Consider Canada and ourselves. Nothing but a map line divides us. We have, with the aid of Great Britain, kept the peace between us for over 100 years without warships on the Great Lakes or fortifications on the land boundary. We are two nations, for Canada is a nation in all but name; two nations, but in all essential things one people, with the same New World spirit. Scores of thousands of Canada's sons and daughters are coming to us, and scores of thousands of our sons and daughters are going to her annually. Both know that they are entering a free country where justice reigns over the heads of all the breed, and where the English-speaking race's characteristic love of justice lives in the hearts of all the breed.

"Shall we permit ourselves to 'be nagged' into antagonism to one another? And yet that is just what is being accomplished toward us in Canada by this hypocritical complaint about Canada having a voice and vote in an assembly where Haiti and Nicaragua and Cuba virtually controlled by us, each has one. Shame on the vote-seeking, hyphenate-fearing, crouching, cowardly politician, or yellow journal, that would sow the seed of unwarranted and unwanted discord and suspicion of them in our hearts, or of us in their hearts, and all to satisfy an European-bred hatred, unjustified, perhaps, even there at this date, and, at any rate, unwarrantably transported hither to vex our peace.

"George Creel truly says in 'The War, the World, and Wilson': 'The draft of the league constitution was denounced even before its contents were known or explained. The bare fact that the document had proved acceptable to the British Empire aroused the instant antagonism of the "professional" Irish-American, the "professional" German-American, and the "professional" Italian-American, and all those whose political fortunes depended upon the persistence and accentuation of racial prejudices' in America. I like his use of the word 'professional' in that connection. Were you ever thrown in contact, in New York, Chicago, or elsewhere, with a 'professional southerner'? One of these 'I'm no damned Yankee, sir, I am a southern gentleman, sir' sort? What a disgusting creature he is to a real southerner, who lives at home and really is a gentleman, without need to loud-mouth his own attestation to the fact. He is in sectional nagging just what these 'professional' hyphenates are in international nagging. By the way, I wish all of you would read 'The War, the World, and Wilson,' although its author, George Creel, proves, at several places in it, that he is himself an anti-British 'nagger'; as, for example, on page 236, where he says: 'For centuries the British Government has made trade its God, annexation its religion, and while there is reason to believe that a new generation is commencing to view hypocrisy and rapacity with disgust, the official class is still the creature of its habit.'

"This statement is 'epigrammatic' and 'Smart Alecky,' but is unfortunate in two respects; first, in the main it is positively untrue; second, in so far as it is true—concerning questionable past annexations—it is applicable to all Governments and peoples of the old era of wars of conquest, which we are trying to displace by a new era. It was true of ourselves in our relations with Indian tribes, Mexicans, Filipinos, Porto Ricans, and everybody else who stood in the way of our so-called manifest destiny. The statement displays a deep-seated, though perhaps even unconscious, hatred of the country of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, and Tennyson in literature; of Robert Cecil, Chatham, and Gladstone and James Bryce in statesmanship; of Stephenson and Arkwright in invention; of Sir Isaac Newton and Tyndall in science; of Wyckliffe, Tyndale, 'Master Ridley,' Bishop Hooker, and Archbishop French in religion; of Queen Elizabeth and Oliver Cromwell as rulers of men and events. It is a mere repetition of what Napoleon said about a 'nation of shopkeepers and hypocrites' in bulletins scattered broadcast all over the continent of Europe until he was taught better at Torres Vedras and Waterloo; a mere replica of what the Kaiser said—though he added a few remarks about 'the contemptible British Army'—until he, too, was taught better at Ypres and the Somme. It is, moreover, just what is being said right now about us Americans over most of the continent of Europe. In short, it is mere 'nagging,' and like most nagging lacks in its essential elements the rather desirable quality of truth. The book, however, is upon the whole the most valuable American contribution to 'The Wilson and League of Nations controversy,' except because they are more tense and go more into fundamentals and less into nonessentials, the letters and addresses on both subjects of Charles Elliot, president emeritus of Harvard.

"My friends, you can not as an individual live peaceably and usefully in any community, exercising influence for good, if not leadership, by dwelling constantly and publicly on all the faults and none of the virtues of your neighbors, nor by cynically staying in your own house and claiming all the rights and shirking all the obligations of the community. No nation can so live in the community of nations. The earth is small now, just a neighborhood. I suppose you could circumnavigate it in 10 days if your airship could carry water and food and gasoline enough, and if one more man and one more pilot were aboard to give you and your pilot a chance to eat and sleep. Let us not take too seriously ourselves and our claim of 'independence' of the moral consciousness of the balance of the world.

Above all, let the peoples stop nagging one another.

France and England, the two most enlightened and cultured nations of Europe, kept it up over 300 years, with what sad and useless results history attests, until a mere adventurer, Napoleon III, put an end to the foolishness. The English and we kept it up until it resulted in the totally unnecessary war of 1812, that Mr. Jefferson held back while he had power, and about our respective participation in which the schoolbooks of both countries have been teaching their children lies ever since. It would not be so bad but both sets of lies are taught in the grand old language of the King James version of the Bible, of Bunyon's Pilgrim's Progress, and of the English prayer book and the Westminster catechism.

"France nagged Germany until she received her lesson in 1870.

"Germany nagged France and incidentally Europe for forty-odd years after 1870 until she got her quietus in our time at the Marne and at Verdun and in the Argonne.

"When you hear a man nagging Ireland, say: 'My friend, I seem to remember "the ould sod" gave birth and breeding to Edmund Burke, prince of rhetoricians and political philosophers, to Oliver Goldsmith, to Tom Moore, to Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and a few other folks like them, and that Phil Sheridan and Pat Cleburne were transplanted products of Irish loins.' If one is nagging Great Britain, say: 'My friend, it seems to me that the common law and habeas corpus and trial by jury, the great charter and the "Bill of Rights," and all our liberties had their first birth over there, and were imbedded in the tongue which Shakespeare spoke when Jamestown was settled and which we speak. Am I right in thinking that Simon de Montfort and Hampden and Sidney and Milton and John Bunyan and John Bright and some other folks like them were Englishmen, or that George Washington and Robert E. Lee were English transplanted to America, as Thomas Jefferson and Jefferson Davis were Welsh and James Wilson and Woodrow Wilson were Scotch, and Patrick Henry, Stonewall Jackson, and Andrew Jackson and William McKinley were Scotch-Irish or Ulster men—all transplanted to America and all leaving behind them what they had been transplanted from?' If one nags Italians—dagoes, as he will probably call them—tell him 'they are the descendants of the world-conquering Roman, the Rome-conquering Goth—countrymen of Virgil, Horace, Cato, Rienzi, of Petrarch, Dante, Ariosto, of Cavour and Garibaldi, and of Savonarola, the first reformer—and their country the land of virtually all the popes or bishops of Rome, certainly the ablest and most world-wise of them. They can not all well deserve the hatred or contempt of a fellow as parochial and ignorant as you.'

"If Germany is being nagged, say: 'My friend, they have recently done some awfully wrong things, those Germans, but consider the insane Kaiser and the miserable Junkerthum that ordered them done, and whether you as a private soldier would not have thought twice before you hazarded disobedience in war times to your military superiors, though you might have obeyed bloody orders with tears in your eyes, as captured journals and diaries of some Germans prove they did. Remember their 40 years of damnable and damning miseducation in a faith of national conceit and state worship, and thank your God that you were never molded in that mold. Remember that before that period Goethe and Schiller and Lessing and Heine and Von Avut and Schlegel and Tieck and Emanuel Kant and Martin Luther with his German Bible and hymns had proven that good could come and had come even out of that Nazareth. Remember that Carl Schurz and many like him transplanted to those shores have more than counterbalanced by their nobility of life and loyal Americanism the contemptibility and disloyalty of Viereck and his sort in our day.'

"If one is nagging France—Oh, well—Lafayette, Rochambeau—let them arise from their graves and give fitting rebuke to those who would arouse hatred of the land of St. Louis the King, of Moliere the dramatist, of Mirabeau the orator, Victor Hugo the poet, of Colign the reformer, and last though not least of the heroes of the Marne and of Verdun.

"What means all this pretense of fear that if we go into a covenant to keep the peace of the world all the others will be devils, watching us—the one lone angel—for a chance to do us some wrong? If they can risk trusting us, can not we risk trusting them?

"Are you any stronger physically, superior in native intellect, better in moral purpose, or better trained for war or peace than the average Englishman, Scotchman, Welshman, Canadian, Australian, Frenchman, Italian, Switzer, or man of Prague? If you think so, your egotism is the adviser of your ignorance. One is not poorer as a teacher than the other as a pupil. I know better.

"Oh, but you are 'different,' you are 'an American.' To be an American in tradition, ideal, democratic faith, and New-World hope is to be the greatest thing on this earth to-day.

"But racially speaking, except the Negroes, all of you are Europeans. Such is your origin and your blood. The only American racially is the red man. Can you not trust your own race, the white men of Europe? Do it then; go in with them not merely to help but to lead the cause of 'peace on earth and good will to men.' But let him who has come from his mother country in Europe more recently than you in the loins of your ancestors did do what you and I have done—leave the wrangles of Europe on the other side of the sea, so that each of us as an American nationally, not racially, can give in highest purpose the best service of an impartial soul to America, and through America represented in an amphictyonic council of the civilized world to the whole world and all mankind."

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no amendment to offer to the next amendment, or no objection to make to it. I refer to the amendment which eliminates line 21 and part of line 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment in line 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is on page 64, line 17, where it is proposed to strike out "1¼" and insert "1⅛," so as to read:

Less than three-fourths and not less than three-eighths of 1 inch in diameter, 1⅛ cents per pound.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that the amendment which I offered proposed to strike out all of these lines in which these three amendments of the committee to the specific rates are offered. My whole amendment was voted down; and now, of course, I do not desire to offer any further amendment to the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is on line 19, where it is proposed to strike out "2⅛" and insert 1⅝," so as to read:

Less than three-eighths and not less than five-sixteenths of 1 inch in diameter, 1⅛ cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. In line 20 it is proposed to strike out "4" and insert "3," so as to read:

Less than five-sixteenths of 1 inch in diamter, 3 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, on lines 21 and 22, the following words:

Chain and chains of all kinds, of iron or steel, not specially provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. In line 23, in lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by the committee, "50," it is proposed to insert "35," so as to read: "sprocket and machine chains, of iron or steel, and parts thereof, 35 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as a substitute for the committee amendment I move to insert "25" instead of "35."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On line 23, in lieu of the sum proposed by the committee, it is proposed to insert "25," so that it will read:

Sprocket and machine chains, of iron or steel, and parts thereof, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announceemnt as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. HALE. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. DIAL. On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which I transfer to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Underwood
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Robinson	Watson, Ga.
Culberson	La Follette	Sheppard	Williams
Dial	McKellar	Simmons
Harrison	Norris	Swanson
Heflin	Overman	Trammell

NAYS—39.

Bursum	Hale	McKinley	Rawson
Calder	Harreld	McLean	Shortridge
Capper	Johnson	McNary	Smoot
Cummins	Kellogg	Moses	Spencer
Curtis	Keyes	Nelson	Sterling
du Pont	Ladd	Newberry	Townsend
Edge	Lenroot	Nicholson	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lodge	Oddie	Watson, Ind.
France	McCormick	Phipps	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Poindexter

NOT VOTING—36.

Ball	Ernst	Myers	Shields
Brandegee	Fletcher	New	Smith
Broussard	Gerry	Norbeck	Stanfield

Colt	Harris	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Crow	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Kendrick	Ransdell	Warren
Elkins	King	Reed	Weller

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the modified amendment of the committee.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' BONUS—GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senator in charge of the pending bill for a moment.

A day or two since the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] made historic reference to the attitude of Washington with reference to bonuses, and I expressed a view at the time that, if my memory served me correctly, he was in error. I observe in the RECORD that since that time the Senator from Georgia has called attention to what he regarded as support of his position, and in order that the RECORD may be complete I desire to call his attention to one or two other references.

The matter which I had in mind was a statement which the able Senator from Georgia made upon the 14th of February, 1922, with reference to the Revolutionary War, in which he said:

Washington took his bonus for his service in the Revolutionary War.

In that respect I feel that there is no doubt but that the Senator from Georgia was in error. I read from Sparks's Life of Washington, at page 375, where it is said:

His first care, after establishing himself at Mount Vernon, was to examine minutely into the state of his private affairs, which had become deranged by his long absence and the disorders of the times. His fortune was ample for a republican citizen, and a man who derived neither consequence nor pleasure from display, but it had necessarily suffered a diminution during the war. Adhering rigidly to the resolution he had formed, when he accepted the command of the Army, not to receive any remuneration from the public, either in the shape of pay or other pecuniary reward, he now considered it a duty to repair the losses he had sustained, as well by economy in his style of living, as by all the usual efforts to increase the productiveness of his estates.

Some of his countrymen, estimating his services to the public at their just value, and knowing the injury his private affairs had suffered in consequence of them, hoped to change his purpose of refusing pecuniary compensation. A few days before he resigned his commission the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania sent the following instructions on this subject to the delegates in Congress from that State:

"Though his Excellency General Washington proposes in a short time to retire, yet his illustrious actions and virtues render his character so splendid and venerable that it is highly probable the admiration and esteem of the world may make his life in a very considerable degree public, as numbers will be desirous of seeing the great and good man, who has so eminently contributed to the happiness of a Nation. His very services to his country may, therefore, subject him to expenses, unless he permits her gratitude to interpose.

"We are perfectly acquainted with the disinterestedness and generosity of his soul. He thinks himself amply rewarded for all his labors and cares by the love and prosperity of his fellow citizens. It is true no rewards they can bestow can be equal to his merits. But they ought not to suffer those merits to be burdensome to him. We are convinced that the people of Pennsylvania would regret such a consequence.

"We are aware of the delicacy with which this subject must be treated. But, relying upon the good sense of Congress, we wish it may engage their early attention."

These instructions were received by the delegates, and a copy was forwarded to General Washington after he had arrived at Mount Vernon. It was not thought advisable to lay them before Congress, or take any steps in fulfilling them, without his previous knowledge and approbation. In this case, as in every other, he acted consistently with his character. He promptly declined the intended favor. All proceedings on the subject were accordingly stopped. There can be no doubt that the sentiments of the Executive Council of Pennsylvania would have been responded to by the whole Nation, and that a liberal grant from Congress would everywhere have met with a cordial assent.

On page 382 the subject is continued and specific reference is made to a proposed land grant. Without taking the time of the Senate to read, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD certain matter which appears on pages 382, 383, and 384 of the same volume.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

The hopes of General Washington, in regard to his favorite scheme of internal navigation, were more than realized. The Legislature of Virginia, after duly considering his letter to the governor, not only appointed the commission for surveys, but organized two companies, called the Potomac Co. and the James River Co., for the purpose of carrying the plan into effect. They moreover complimented him without a dissenting voice, by a donation of 50 shares in the former company, and 100 shares in the latter, the 50 shares being estimated at $10,000, and the others at £5,000. Aware of his delicacy on the subject of receiving money from the public, the legislature contrived to frame the preamble of the act in such language, as, it was hoped, would remove his scruples. "It is the desire of the representatives of this Commonwealth to embrace every suitable occasion of testifying their sense of the unexampled merits of George Washington toward his country; and it is their wish in particular, that those great works for its improvement, which, both as springing from the liberty which he has been so instrumental in establishing, and as encouraged by his patronage, will be durable monuments of his glory, may be made monuments also of the gratitude of his country."

If he was highly gratified, as he must have been, with this public testimony of affection and respect, he was scarcely less embarrassed by it. Not that he hesitated as to the course he should pursue, but the grant had been made in so liberal a manner and from motives so pure that he feared a refusal might be regarded in an unfavorable light as evincing either ingratitude to his friends, or a disposition to gain applause by a show of disinterestedness unusual if not unnecessary. He stated his difficulties freely in private letters to the governor, and to some of the principal members of the legislature; declaring at the same time that he could not, consistently with his principles, accept the proffered gift in such a way, that he should derive from it any emolument to himself. A positive decision was not required till the next session of the legislature, when he wrote officially to the governor declining the grant; but, lest the operations of the companies should be retarded by withdrawing the subscriptions for the shares which had been made by the treasurer on his account he suggested that if the assembly should think proper to submit to him the appropriation of them for some object of a public nature he would accept the trust. His proposition was cheerfully acceded to, and by an act of the assembly the shares were assigned to such public objects as he should direct during his life or by his last will and testament.

The purpose which he first had in view was the encouragement of education, and this purpose was ultimately accomplished. Some time before his death he made over the shares in the James River Co. to an institution in Rockbridge County, then called Liberty Hall Academy. The name has since been changed to Washington College. The 50 shares in the Potomac Co. he bequeathed in perpetuity for the endowment of a university in the District of Columbia, under the auspices of the Government; and if such a seminary should not be established by the Government the fund was to increase till it should be adequate, with such other resources as might be obtained, for the accomplishment of the design. The establishing of a national university was always one of his favorite schemes. He recommended it in his messages to Congress, and often in his letters spoke of the advantages which would be derived from it to the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. Referring to the Life of Washington, by John Marshall, volume 2, page 70, we find that Washington said in a letter:

When I was first called to the station with which I was honored during the late conflict for our liberties, to the diffidence which I had so many reasons to feel in accepting it I thought it my duty to join a firm resolution to shut my hand against every pecuniary recompense. To this resolution I have invariably adhered, and from it (if I had the inclination) I do not consider myself at liberty now to depart.

I ask to have inserted three paragraphs from the last will of Washington, beginning on page 546 of Sparks's Life of Washington.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Item: To the trustees (governors, or by whatsoever other name they may be designated) of the academy in the town of Alexandria I give and bequeath, in trust $4,000, or in other words 20 of the shares which I hold in the Bank of Alexandria, toward the supporting of a free school established at and annexed to the said academy, for the purpose of educating such orphan children or the children of such other poor and indigent persons as are unable to accomplish it with their own means, and who, in the judgment of the trustees of the said seminary, are best entitled to the benefit of this donation. The aforesaid 20 shares I give and bequeath in perpetuity, the dividends only of which are to be drawn for and applied by the said trustees for the time being for the uses above mentioned; the stock to remain entire and untouched, unless indications of failure of the said bank should be so apparent, or a discontinuance thereof, should render a removal of this fund necessary. In either of these cases the amount of the stock here devised is to be vested in some other bank or public institution whereby the interest may with regularity and certainty be drawn and applied as above. And to prevent misconception my meaning is, and is hereby declared to be, that these 20 shares are in lieu of and not in addition to the thousand pounds given by a missive letter some years ago, in consequence whereof an annuity of 50 pounds has since been paid toward the support of this institution.

Item: Whereas by a law of the Commonwealth of Virginia, enacted in the year 1785, the legislature thereof was pleased, as an evidence of its approbation of the services I had rendered the public during the Revolution, and partly, I believe, in consideration of my having suggested the vast advantages which the community would derive from the extension of its inland navigation under legislative patronage, to present me with 100 shares of $100 each in the incorporated company, established for the purpose of extending the navigation of James River from the tidewater to the mountains; and also with 50 shares of £100 sterling each in the corporation of another company, likewise established for the similar purpose of opening the navigation of the River Potomac from the tidewater to Fort Cumberland; the acceptance of which, although the offer was highly honorable and grateful to my feelings, was refused, as inconsistent with a principle which I had adopted and had never departed from, viz, not to receive pecuniary compensation for any services I could render my country in its arduous struggle with Great Britain for its rights, and because I had evaded similar propositions from other States in the Union, adding to this refusal, however, an intimation that if it should be the pleasure of the legislature to permit me to appropriate the said shares to public uses I would receive them on those terms with due sensibility; and this it having consented to, in flattering terms, as will appear by a subsequent law and sundry resolutions in the most ample and honorable manner, I proceed after this recital, for the more correct understanding of the case, to declare that as it has always been a source of serious regret with me to see the youth of these United States sent to foreign countries for the purpose of education, often before their minds were formed or they had imbibed any adequate ideas of the happiness of their own, contracting too frequently not only habits of dissipation and extravagance but principles unfriendly to republican government and to the true and genuine liberties of mankind, which thereafter are rarely overcome; for these reasons it has been my ardent wish to see a plan devised on a liberal scale which would have a tendency to spread systematic ideas through all parts of this rising empire, thereby to do away local attachments and State prejudices, as far as the nature of things would, or, indeed, ought to admit, from our national councils. Looking anxiously forward to the accomplishment of so desirable an object as this is, in my estimation, my mind has not been able to contemplate any plan more likely to effect the measure than the establishment of a university in a central part of the United States to which the youths of fortune and talents from all parts thereof may be sent for the completion of their education, in all the branches of polite literature, in arts and sciences, in acquiring knowledge in the principles of politics and good government, and, as a matter of infinite importance, in my judgment, by associating with each other and forming friendships in juvenile years, be enabled to free themselves in a proper degree from those local prejudices and habitual jealousies which have just been mentioned, and which, when carried to excess, are never-failing sources of disquietude to the public mind and pregnant of mischievous consequences to this country. Under these impressions so fully dilated—

Item: I give and bequeath, in perpetuity, the 50 shares which I hold in the Potomac Co. (under the aforesaid acts of the Legislature of Virginia) toward the endowment of a university, to be established within the limits of the District of Columbia, under the auspices of the General Government, if that Government should incline to extend a fostering hand toward it; and, until such seminary is established and the funds arising on these shares shall be required for its support, my further will and desire is that the profit accruing therefrom shall, whenever the dividends are made, be laid out in purchasing stock in the Bank of Columbia, or some other bank, at the discretion of my executors, or by the Treasurer of the United States for the time being, under the direction of Congress, provided that honorable body should patronize the measure; and the dividends proceeding from the purchase of such stock are to be vested in more stock, and so on, until a sum adequate to the accomplishment of the object is attained, of which I have not the smallest doubt before many years pass away, even if no aid or encouragement is given by the legislative authority or from any other source.

Item: The hundred shares which I hold in the James River Co. I have given, and now confirm, in perpetuity to and for the use and benefit of Liberty Hall Academy, in the county of Rockbridge, in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Mr. BORAH. It seems that there was some land granted to Washington with the express understanding at the time it was taken that Washington was to dispose of it for the public interest, or for some public welfare, which he afterwards did by his will, as disclosed by the paragraphs which I have asked to have inserted, which appear upon pages 546, 547, and 548 of Sparks's Life of Washington.

The Senator from Georgia has cited certain instances with reference to the French and Indian war, and the citations which he has made seem to sustain the view which he takes of the matter. I had in view, at the time I expressed the opinion I did, the Revolutionary War and compensations or bonuses from the Revolutionary War, and I feel very certain, after making the examination which I have made, that I was correct in my construction that he received no compensation, no bonus, and no gratuity for his services in that war.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, when the Senator from Idaho first raised this question I stated distinctly that it was well known that General Washington refused to accept any reward for his services in the Revolutionary War. He asked that he be paid the expenses he had actually incurred, and he would not accept anything further.

The Senator will remember that I made that statement on the first afternoon when he raised the question as to whether or not Washington ever sanctioned the principle of a soldiers' bounty, bonus, or reward; but I stated then, and restate now, that the authorities show that in a previous war, the French and Indian war, he had not only worked for a bonus for his soldiers, for his fellow officers, for his companions in arms, but had accepted a bonus for himself both in cash and in land.

Mr. BORAH. As I said, I think that the statement as made with reference to the Indian war seems to be borne out by the authorities, but the statement to which I had reference at the time I was discussing the matter was the statement upon the part of the Senator, which I think the Senator will agree, was in error:

Washington took his bonus for his services in the Revolutionary War.

I do not believe history will sustain that contention.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Whether it will or not, that does not at all effect the principle as to whether Washington gave the weight of his great authority to the propriety of a soldier accepting a reward in money or in land, without incurring the reproach of commercializing his bravery or commercializing his patriotism. That was the point at issue.

In Marshall's Life of Washington, I repeat, on page 11 he states:

Great credit was given to Colonel Washington by his countrymen for the courage displayed on this occasion—

Namely, the occasion of his campaign up the Ohio against the Indians—and the legislature were so satisfied with the conduct of the party as to vote their thanks to him and the officers under his command. They—also gave 300 pistoles to be distributed among the soldiers engaged in the action, as a reward for their bravery.

That is, the legislature—

I pointed out that the Spanish pistole was worth $4 in our money; and, therefore, this was a very substantial cash bonus. Whether that much was to be paid to each soldier or the entire amount to be divided among the soldiers, the text does not make clear; but whether the one or the other was the case, the principle was the same. The legislature voted them a bonus as a reward for their bravery in battle with the Indians on the Monongahela, and Washington, in a letter which Marshall puts in the footnote, acknowledges with thanks the action of the Virginia Assembly.

In Sparks's Life of Washington, beside the section which I quoted the other afternoon, at pages 67 and 68, it is said:

Another and more substantial proof soon followed—

That is to say, substantial proof of the gratitude of the people of Virginia for the military services rendered by Washington and his men in fighting the Indians off the frontier.

The Virginia Legislature voted £40,000 for the public service.

This was English money, each pound being worth $4.84, as all men know.

Three hundred pounds—

Or more than $1,400—

were likewise granted to Colonel Washington.

Here was a cash bonus voted in bulk to Washington's men, and a separate sum voted specifically to Colonel Washington—more than $1,400—and, allowing for the difference in the value of money, it would be now anywhere from $7,000 to $10,000. It was a very substantial bonus for a few weeks' service in the Ohio woods against bands of Indians.

The specific ground upon which the Virginia Legislature or Assembly voted that sum and the other sums, to wit, "proportional sums to the other officers and privates," was "for their gallant behavior and losses at the Battle of the Monongahela."

On page 110 of Sparks's Life of Washington we find this:

In the midst of his public engagements another affair, extremely vexatious in its details, employed much of his attention—

That is, the attention of Washington—

The claims of the officers and soldiers to land, granted by Governor Dinwiddie as a reward for their services at the beginning of the French War, met with innumerable obstacles for a long time, first from the ministry in England and next from the authorities in Virginia. By his unwearied exertions, however, and by these alone, and mostly at his own expense, the matter was at last adjusted.

As we would say, he lobbied for it, in an honorable way, of course.

In Lodge's Life of Washington, which I regard as a classic work of biography, in volume 1, page 109, we find the following:

While thus looking after his own estates at home, he went further afield in search of investments, keeping a shrewd eye on the western lands, and buying wisely and judiciously whenever he had the opportunity. He also constituted himself now, as in a later time, the champion of the soldier, for whom he had the truest sympathy and affection, and a large part of the correspondence of this period is devoted to their claims for the land granted them by the assembly. He distinguished carefully among them, however, those who were undeserving, and to the major of the regiment, who had been excluded from the public thanks on account of cowardice at the Great Meadows, he wrote as follows: "Your impertinent letter was delivered to me yesterday. As I am not accustomed to receive such from any man, nor would have taken the same language from you personally without letting you feel some marks of my resentment, I would advise you to be cautious in writing me a second time of the same tenor. But for your stupidity and sottishness you might have known, by attending to the public gazette, that you had your full quantity of 10,000 acres of land allowed you. But suppose you had really fallen short—

That is, of his full quota of this bonus land—

do you think your superlative merit entitles you to a greater indulgence than others? * * * All my concern is that I ever engaged in behalf of so ungrateful a fellow as you are."

Now, Mr. President, it there appears plainly that although this man had shown cowardice in the face of the enemy, he was to get his full share of 10,000 acres of land as a bonus, and, of course, the others got theirs. Washington himself got 16,000 acres.

Mr. President, some one, evidently from the editorial room of a leading Boston paper, sent me a clipping. I would not say it was from the Globe. I did not notice that particularly, but it was heavily marked with a pencil such as editors ordinarily use. It was sent to me without comment. It is an old letter, dated 1781, as I remember the date. I left the clipping at my room, not supposing this matter would come up again. That letter speaks of how in Massachusetts the legislature voted land and money to the soldiers of the Revolutionary War as a bonus, a bounty, a reward, a recognition of the splendid service which they had rendered in achieving the liberties of their country. I may say that almost, if not quite, without exception every State from Massachusetts to Georgia, inclusive, was generous to the extent of princely liberality in giving land warrants to the soldiers of the Revolutionary War. There was a time in Tennessee when those revolutionary military land warrants formed legal tender currency, and were about the only money which was current in the backwoods.

Mr. President, all I wished to establish was that the great authority, Washington, was on the side of the bonus. Now, reflection would seem to convince me that the loose confederation, the old confederation, had no lands to give. It had little of anything else to give. It was a very loose bond holding together sovereign States until they could accomplish the great purpose of winning independence. But the States composing the confederation all had large domains, so far as I remember, and as soon as the Union was formed it was given magnificent domains by the State of Virginia and perhaps others. The great Northwest Territory was an empire in itself. The States of Alabama and Mississippi were carved out of land that had belonged to the colony of Georgia, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], now sitting before me, well knows. It is a mere quibble as to whether or not the old confederation granted the land or whether the sovereign States composing it granted the land. I would not dogmatically say that I was entirely accurate about that. The point, and the sole point, was to enlist on the side of the bonus the splendid authority of so noble a man, so proud a man, so fearless a soldier, so untarnished a patriot, as George Washington.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATE, WAR DEPARTMENT, 1921 (S. DOC. NO. 214).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for the War Department, fiscal year 1921, for the acquisition of certain parcels of land contiguous to aviation fields, $22,759, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

LANDS AT WALTER REED GENERAL HOSPITAL (S. DOC. NO. 215).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the War Department, fiscal year 1923, for acquisition of land, Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, $44,109.22, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES BY NAVAL VESSELS (S. DOC. NO. 216).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, submitting an estimate of appropriation, in amount $3,995.06, to pay claims for damages by naval vessels which have been adjusted by the Navy Department, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the congress of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, at Springfield, Mass., favoring the erection on Lexington Common by the Federal Government of a suitable memorial to be dedicated on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the battle at Lexington, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the congress of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, at Springfield, Mass., favoring the adoption of a selective and restrictive immigration policy so as to safeguard the Nation as to the future quality of its citizenship, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CURTIS presented petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Dyer antilynching bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of Columbiana Council, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of East Liverpool, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation barring from United States citizenship persons who have obtained military exemption by reason of being aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (S. 3740) regulating the recovery of allotments heretofore paid to designated allottees, which was read twice by its title, and he submitted a report (No. 781) thereon.

Mr. LENROOT, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2874) to authorize the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the coast of Green Bay at or in the vicinity of Strawberry Passage, in Door County, Wis., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 782) thereon.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3350. A bill for the relief of Alice M. Gorman (Rept. No. 783); and

S. 3351. A bill for the relief of G. Dare Hopkins (Rept. No. 784).

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3738) authorizing the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, determine, and render final judgment in the claim of Elwood Grissinger; and

A bill (S. 3739) for the relief of Edwin Greenville Seibels (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 3741) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Patrick H. Bodkin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 215) providing for reinvestigation of the tri-county irrigation project, Nebraska; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the investigation, improvement, encouragement, and determination of the adaptability to different soils and climatic conditions of pecans, almonds, Persian walnuts, black walnuts, hickory nuts, butternuts, chestnuts, filberts, and other nuts, and for methods of growing, harvesting, packing, shipping, storing, and utilizing the same, fiscal years 1922 and 1923, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for temporary maintenance and care of graves in the plot at Ocean View, The Cemetery Beautiful (Inc.), Borough of Richmond, New York, N. Y., in which interments of merchant marines and war veterans have been made, and for the acquisition of additional graves therein for such use, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee, as modified, will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In paragraph 329, line 23, before the words "per cent," strike out "30" and insert "35," so as to read:

Sprocket and machine chains, of iron or steel, and parts thereof, 35 per cent ad valorem.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, at the top of page 65, after the language "2 cents per," to strike out the word "pound" and insert "pound; but no chain or chains of any description, except anchor and stud link chain, shall pay a duty of less than 45 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Senate disagree to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like now to have the Senate consider paragraph 373, shovels, spades, scoops, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota what has become of paragraph 339?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] being absent has requested that that paragraph go over until he returns on Monday.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I had hoped that that paragraph might come up this afternoon. What paragraph does the Senator now desire to consider?

Mr. McCUMBER. Paragraph 373, which is found on page 84.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment to paragraph 373 will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 84, paragraph 373, line 11, after the word "scoops," to insert "scythes, sickles, grass hooks, corn knives."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have not here just at the moment the data regarding those items, but in connection with the general cutlery paragraph the articles sought to be inserted in this paragraph were referred to. Senators will observe the significance of this language. I think it important that Senators should understand what it is now proposed to do.

The amendment would insert scythes, sickles, grass hooks, and corn knives in paragraph 373. Those items, if I remember correctly, are at present on the free list as farm implements. Now it is sought to put a duty of 35 per cent on scythes and sickles and grass hooks and corn knives. As I recall, the information furnished to us by the Tariff Commission is that those articles are not only made as cheaply in this country as any other country in the world, but that we have been exporting very large quantities of them. From an examination of the subject I could not discover any reason why those articles should now be put on the dutiable list. I suppose it is proposed upon the general theory that wages in Germany are low, that some commodities are produced in Germany at a cost seemingly lower than they are produced in the United States.

The paragraph which was just passed over, being paragraph 339, covering enameled ware and aluminum ware and aluminum products, provides for vastly increased duties upon those articles. Yesterday there was exhibited to us one article of aluminum ware which is produced very cheaply in Germany and sold in this market at an enormous price. I presume, regarding this paragraph, we shall again have our attention called to low wages in Germany and to low production costs there. We are met with that suggestion wherever we turn. It looks as if this bill were directed especially at Germany.

The episode which occurred on yesterday at least created the impression that there was great confusion in the minds of the proponents of this bill. The articles which were exhibited were displayed for the purpose of arousing interest throughout the country. The intended dramatic incident, to me at least, was decidedly significant.

When this bill first came before the Senate there was no attempt to explain any of its provisions. There seemed to be a fixed determination to come to a vote upon the various paragraphs and the items embraced in them without any discussion and without any intention to make modifications. However, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] had occasion to go to Indiana. While he was there he evidently heard at least from some sections of the country, and he came back rather alarmed at the situation. He came before the Senate and said that it would no longer suffice to permit this bill to go undefended and that henceforth the Republicans intended to defend the provisions of the bill. He proceeded to make a speech, but he did not refer to a single paragraph in the bill; he did not mention a single rate. He reviewed the history of tariffs in this country from the foundation of the Government down to the present. He mentioned the names of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, of Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, of Dingley and McKinley, Payne and Aldrich, and all the others whose names have been connected with tariff legislation in the past; but he said nothing about a single paragraph of this bill. However, he realized that the discussion of the bill had brought about a revulsion of feeling throughout the country regarding the bill, and he felt that it must be defended. So he proceeded to defend it in that singular way by referring to past history. He made no reference to this bill, except to express it as his opinion that it was the best balanced bill which had ever been presented to the country.

Mr. President, if that be true, it is certainly a severe criticism upon past bills, for from that day till this the Finance Committee has been bringing in here amendments to the bill. Prior to that time amendments were hardly suggested or even seriously considered, but from the time that the Republicans were informed that the country was hearing the truth regarding this bill, that the people who would have to pay for the articles purchased by them the increased price caused by the proposed rates were beginning to object, then they became aroused and they have been bringing in here amendments. On the very paragraph which we passed a few moments ago the committee moved to strike out an amendment which it had proposed enormously increasing the duty upon chains. The committee undoubtedly have heard from the country, and so they are bringing in amendments. I have no doubt that, regarding paragraph 339, which involves enamel ware and aluminum ware, the committee itself will bring in amendments before it is disposed of.

The Senator from Indiana was undoubtedly put forward for the purpose of defending the bill. It was felt that it needed defense, and he, as being the one most capable of making a defense, was put forward for that purpose; but, instead of defending the bill, he tried to have the country hark back to pre-war days. He did not realize that conditions had changed, but was still living in the past. So on yesterday the Senator from Indiana was again called to take the lead here and defend this bill. He did it by one of those spectacular incidents which are calculated to lead the mind astray.

It is inconceivable that the Senator should have considered the evidence which he produced yesterday as a defense of the bill. Several different articles were exhibited. A shotgun which the Senator said cost 90 cents in Germany, but which was sold in this country for $15, was exhibited. The Senator referred to a clock that was sold in Germany for two dollars and a few cents, but is sold in this country for $30, and to a number of other articles selling at a difference in price of nearly as much.

I have thought that it might be well enough to analyze that situation, and see to what extent it is a defense of this bill, and see if we can discover the purpose of presenting here statements of that character.

When we come to consider this enormous spread in price, amounting in some instances to more than 2,000 per cent, the inquiring mind will naturally first want to know who the purchaser was, whether or not it was a purchase made in good faith, and whether or not it was one made in the usual course of trade. We must assume, in the absence of evidence upon that subject, that those purchases were made at the usual price, at the price at which they were being generally sold to the trade. With such assumption we must go further, and conclude that such articles were being generally sold at those prices to the American consumer. In the case of some of those articles, similar articles are made in this country; so the price of the American article must have been equally as high, or else the merchant would not have attempted to make a sale at the price at which the sale was made.

If the foreign article is being sold at such prices, then, as a matter of fact, at least at the present time there is no indication that the American market is being demoralized, because the foreign article is selling at these very high prices. So, if we assume that that is what is going on now, it demonstrates that the American producers now are not being injured by the foreign competition, and, therefore, so far as actual conditions are concerned, there is no necessity for a further or higher protective tariff.

Of course I know what will at once be said—that while they are not being sold now at low prices, yet that there is a potential power which would enable the foreign producer to sell at a lower price, and, therefore, that he might at some future time invade the American market and drive out the American producer. That evidently was the purpose which the Senator from Indiana had in mind in producing those articles; and it becomes necessary, therefore, to consider a little further the situation which actually exists.

In the first place, the Senator from Indiana took up the question of wages in Germany. He gave us the amount of wages which an ounce of gold would buy in the United States and in other countries.

I want to read just what he said:

> It repeatedly has been stated on the floor by those who are opposing this measure that wages are as high in Europe as they were in 1914 and that because of that fact some of these rates were excessive. Mr. President, the statistics show that an ounce of gold purchases 17.22 hours of labor in the United States, 50.16 hours of labor in Great Britain, 95.50 hours of labor in Japan, 117.31 hours in France, and 201.66 hours in Germany. These facts are not disputed.

That is the statement of the Senator from Indiana. An examination of that statement, measured by what we all know, would produce a very different view. He says that an ounce of gold in the United States purchases 17.22 hours of labor. An ounce of gold is worth $20.67. The Senator from Indiana would have us believe that the figures which he presented give an honest view of the labor situation. These calculations have been made upon the basis of what he says is the price of labor in the United States. If an ounce of gold is worth $20.67, and it buys only 17.22 hours of labor, how much is that per hour? Roughly figuring, it is about $1.25. That is the statement brought here in all seriousness as the foundation for the whole argument of the Senator from Indiana; and I want to know how many citizens of this Republic there are who are not willing to say that such a representation is misleading and not consistent with the facts? How many laborers in this country are getting $1.25 per hour?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that the mill operative in New England who gets over $20 a week is an exception.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, Mr. President; and there are millions in this country who do not get over $20 a week. So it must be evident that instead of an ounce of gold being the price of 17.22 hours of labor, it is the price of a week of labor. I do not know who furnished the information; I do not care; but the Senator from Indiana is responsible for coming here and putting those figures into the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The figures would indicate that a laboring man or woman would get about $10 a day of eight hours. Am I correct?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is just about what it would figure out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What class of laboring people, men or women, are there in American who are getting $10 a day?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I presume there are a few in the very highly skilled industries of the country; but certainly there are few within the knowledge of any one of us who receive such high wages as that, and yet we are told that that is typical, that that represents the price of labor in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A few days ago some figures were presented to me giving the average family income in America. That includes all families—families who have incomes of minor children as well as the money that the parents earn—and those figures indicated that the average income per family in America was about $1,200 per annum.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no doubt that the information which the Senator from Massachusetts now presents may represent the average family income per annum in the United States; but, Mr. President, I know that there are great classes of wage earners in this country who do not receive one-half the figure stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. Take the laborers upon the farms of this country, and in many other vocations, and they do not earn any $1,200 per year; but I have no doubt the Senator is correct in saying that that may be the average.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. Including the incomes of the exceedingly rich and the incomes of the poor, averaged, it amounts to about $1,200 per annum.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes. Now, Mr. President, if that is the foundation of the Senator's argument, when it falls the rest of it necessarily falls.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Indiana is not present, and I have not had an opportunity to analyze the particular portion of his speech to which the Senator refers; but my impression is that the estimate made by the Senator referred to the highest-class labor in some branches of the steel industry. I think Mr. Schwab made the statement some time ago that in some branches of his industry the wage was $10 a day. I merely state this, in the absence of the Senator from Indiana, because, while he may not have referred to that industry, I think that is the industry from which these estimates were taken.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have his own explanation for it here in his speech. I was interested in that subject yesterday when the Senator was addressing us, and so I asked him to give us the date when those estimates were made, and he said as of the 1st of February. Then I asked him:

> Will the Senator state also as to what line of occupation those figures relate? The Senator doubtless knows that wages vary in the different lines of occupation in every country in the world.
> Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding is that these figures were collated from five of the key industries in the various countries.

Of course, it is important to know what the industry is. It is important to know also the position of the worker in the industry, and it was information regarding that which I sought to elicit from the Senator from Indiana, and his reply I have just read.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that there are thousands of industries in the country, and there may be five in which the employees receive that wage. I hardly think it quite fair for the Senator to assume that the Senator from Indiana claimed that the average wage paid to the average employee in this country was more than a dollar an hour. I do not think anybody would claim that, and I do not think the Senator from Indiana wished to convey any such impression.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, if the Senator from Indiana did not mean to convey that impression, his statement was of no avail whatsoever; it answered no purpose. The question at issue was as to the cost of labor in the United States and other countries. That was what he was seeking to present to the Senate. He also presented it for the purpose of having an effect upon this bill, defending this bill, and he chose to tell us that that was the price of labor in five of the key industries in the United States, and not only in the United States but in other countries. The impression which he sought to convey—and I am glad to see the Senator from Indiana now entering the Chamber—was that that was the wage which was common, which represented the amount that the laborers of this country were receiving.

I shall be glad to repeat, for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana, who is now in the Chamber, the point which is now under discussion. On yesterday the Senator from Indiana undertook to give the cost of labor in the United States and in other countries. He made the statement that an ounce of gold in the United States would purchase 17.22 hours of labor, and then he gave the number of hours of labor which an ounce of gold would purchase in other countries. I have just called to the attention of the Senate the fact that an ounce of gold is worth $20.67, and I now ask the Senator from Indiana if he believes that 17.22 hours of labor in the five key industries of the United States bring any such sum as $20.67? I observe that the Senator is looking over his remarks of yesterday, and I hope he will have some explanation to offer later on.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I had these figures in my mind the other day, but I do not have them in my mind now. The statement I read from was made in the British Parliament, as I then stated, by a member of that body, and afterwards there were some inquiries made here of some people connected with the Tariff Commission. I know it was talked about, as I stated in my speech the other day, among the members of the Finance Committee in a general talk we had about the subject of wages in Germany, and at that time it was given out that these figures were substantially correct and were authenticated and indorsed by the members of the Tariff Commission. I did not go into the details, but I did publish, in a speech I previously made on that subject some two or three weeks ago, a whole page of figures showing what the Tariff Commission expressly did state as to the wages paid in Germany, and while I did not take these figures and compare them with the figures I put in, my information was that they were substantially comparable. In other words, these figures represent highly skilled labor. My understanding is that, so far as Germany is concerned, there is not such a great spread between the wages paid the highly skilled labor and those paid the common labor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator used this other language yesterday in answer to a question which I propounded to him:

> My understanding is that these figures were collated from five of the key industries in the various countries.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; the steel and various other industries.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Is the Senator still contending that about $1.25 an hour is an average of the cost of labor in any one industry in the United States?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I would not say that without an examination——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not believe the Senator would.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Because I do not know. I would not commit myself unreservedly to a proposition of that kind;

but this statement was made, as I understand it, along in January or February, and while there has been some decline in wages since that time in the United States, I would not say whether or not that wage obtains now in any one of the five key industries; I do not know. But for the purposes of the statement I was making the mere cent or penny would not make any difference. The point I was trying to make was the big spread between wages in the United States and wages in Germany in the same industries. These figures are relatively correct, even though they may not be right to the very penny; and as to that I have not any doubt.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would like to know upon what responsibility the Senator makes that statement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I make that statement upon my responsibility as a Senator, after having investigated this subject for a long time and after having collated all these figures. These figures may not represent to the penny the wages paid in the five key industries at this time; I do not pretend to say they do. But I do pretend to say that the wages paid in Germany are one-fifth of what they are in the United States in similar industries, and our information is that in many industries as low as one-tenth what they are in the United States. I am assuming that is correct, after all the investigation we have made.

As to whether or not these figures are exactly right, I do not know, and for the purposes of my argument I do not care. What I am trying to get at is this—a tariff which measures the difference, substantially, between the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad. We can not take a yardstick and measure to the tenth of an inch on a proposition of that kind, but these figures are substantially accurate for our purposes, because there is that big spread between wages paid in the United States and wages paid in Germany.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator has just been stating from his general recollection, of course?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That wages in this country are perhaps five times as high as those in Germany, or, in some instances, ten times as high. He thinks they may reach that figure?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in this table which he gave to the Senate on yesterday it appears that the wages paid in the United States are just about fifteen times as high as the wages paid in Germany, and I ask the Senator if he ever heard anybody suggest that the wages in this country were fifteen times as high as the wages in Germany?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I think so, in some instances.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator stand for the proposition that in five key industries in the United States, compared with five key industries in Germany, the wages here are fifteen times as high as those in Germany?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then the statement of the Senator a moment ago was made without further investigation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The statement is made here that an ounce of gold will purchase in the United States 17.22 hours of labor only and in Germany 201.66 hours. I have not figured it exactly, but, roughly speaking, it is about fifteen times as much.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not gone accurately into those comparisons. I took that statement made on the floor of the British Parliament, which was substantially authenticated here. I did not go into the details. Afterwards I had the Tariff Commission supply me with statements of relative wages in various industries, a number of them in the United States and in Germany. I did not take the trouble to take my pencil and figure whether or not the wages as expressed in the columns they gave me and these wages as expressed in gold, the figures I have put in the RECORD, were substantially correct, but I did run over them in my mind enough to know that after all they really expressed pretty nearly the difference in wages paid in this country and in Germany, and I do not care whether they are accurate or not for the purposes of my argument.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And the Senator is still of that opinion, is he?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am still of the opinion that that substantially represents at all events the difference in wages, and for the purposes of this argument I do not care whether they measure the difference right down to the penny or not. From my viewpoint it does not make any difference, and for the purpose of the argument I was making the other day that was not a substantial matter. I did show the cheapness of production abroad by exhibiting various articles I had here. I do not care whether the Senator says the wages here are fifteen times as high as those in Germany or not. What I was showing was the cheapness of production abroad and the necessity of a protective tariff to protect our people making those things if the industries of this country are to survive against such ruinous competition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had rather expected a different reply from the Senator from Indiana, and all that I can do is to submit these figures, because this is something about which everyone has some knowledge and some information; but the only result which could follow the production of such figures was the creation of the impression that there had been an actual investigation, and that the statistics had been collated—he uses the term "collated"; that the calculations had been made; that they had been figured down to the very fraction of a cent—17.22 hours of labor in America for an ounce of gold and 201.66 hours of labor in Germany. Anyone accepting those statements upon the faith and sincerity of the distinguished Senator from Indiana must have gotten the notion that the matter was thoroughly investigated and that those were the facts, but now the Senator from Indiana tells us that it was a statement of some member of the British Parliament.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is what I said when I put it in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not find that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. At page 9137.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator quote the source of his statistics?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; the statistics come from the English Parliament, and have been indorsed, according to my understanding, by our own Tariff Commission. That is my own understanding.

That is what I say now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That it was indorsed by the Tariff Commission? That makes it worse.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no. The Senator is again endeavoring to pin me down to an exactitude to which I did not commit myself originally and do not now. I stated, or I think I stated, in the speech then that the matter was afterwards discussed among the Republican members of the committee; that in the talk among the Republican members of the committee about the difference in wages here and abroad it was stated—or I got the impression—that the Tariff Commission had practically indorsed and authenticated the figures. I did not call up members of the Tariff Commission to find out whether they had or not. We discussed every day among the Republican members for a good while the difference in wages paid in this country and in Germany. I did not take any yardstick to measure them exactly. I did not know and I do not know now, and neither does the Senator know. But I did know, if the figures did not exactly express the difference, that, after all, there was such a wide difference that we were justified in putting on high rates in order to protect American industry. The general statement was all I cared anything about, and that is all I care anything about now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I agree with the Senator from Indiana when he says he does not know what the difference in wages is.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Whether American labor is getting the wage referred to or not, it is quite clear to my mind that if the prices of these various exhibits are to be increased, as they will be increased under the pending bill, it will be necessary that American labor shall get that wage.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no; I disagree with my good friend from Ohio. In other words, if the arguments I used the other day when I put the different articles on exhibition here as Exhibits A, B, C, and so forth, as lawyers do in a lawsuit, are to prove anything it is finally that there is no way to protect Americans engaged in these industries except by the system of the American valuation. That is the legitimate and logical conclusion of that argument. Yet we are not seeking to do that. I was not stating those facts as a basis for that conclusion. That is the legitimate end of the whole thing, I will say; because if those figures are correct, I will state to my friend from New Mexico a fact that he well knows, we would have to put on 1,000 or 1,500 per cent, and it would not make any difference, as the Senator knows, if it took 1,000 per cent to protect an American industry in any branch, the American people simply would not stand for 1,000 per cent. The Senator knows that. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] the other day voiced that sentiment in a most peculiar way—if I am not interrupting the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will be a little more liberal than the Senator was with me yesterday. I yield further.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I gave up about one-half of the time I had to Senators on the other side of the Chamber, so much so that Senators on my side complained of my liberality and generosity. I did not intend to be discourteous, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico.

The Senator from Kentucky, in a little colloquy he and I had, said that he would not stand for 100 per cent on anything, that it would be too high; that he might stand for 25 per cent, or language to that effect, but he could not come down to the exact nickle. My theory is that there is no such thing as high protection and low protection. A protective tariff is one that is protective, that measures the difference adequately between wages here and in a competing country.

That is protection. That is a fixed and definite yardstick, if we can find out what the wages are in the two countries. We have not been able to find that out to any certainty. I said so in my speech yesterday and have said so repeatedly on the floor and elsewhere. We have done the very best we could. To use the old illustration, it is like the fellow trying to build a dam in a flood. That is the situation we are in now. We can not always be sure of the foundation stone, but I will say this to my friend——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Now, Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Just this one sentence, and I shall quit. Wherever any element of doubt entered into it, so far as I was personally concerned, I wanted to make the tariff absolutely high enough to resolve the doubt in favor of the American producer and not the foreign competitor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not willing to accept in whole the illustration about the building of a dam during a flood as representative of the present situation. I want to suggest for the consideration of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, that if he is going to build the dam he should wait until the flood goes by, when he knows it is going by, and when he can build his dam under better conditions, when he can build a dam that will serve the country after the flood has gone by.

Mr. President, I have heretofore presented a good many facts gathered by the Tariff Commission, by the Department of Commerce, by the Federal Reserve Board, and by official sources, bearing upon the conditions in Germany. My colleague upon the committee, the minority leader on the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has likewise presented much data upon the subject. To-day the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made a very illuminating contribution to the subject. But it seems that we are always confronted, regardless of the official information, by this ever rising ghost of Germany, speaking in an economic sense. Day after day the figures have been presented here. They ought to be conclusive to any fair and open-minded person. Every evidence is that the so-called flood referred to by the Senator from Indiana is a temporary flood. It is passing by. It will soon be over. If there ever was a time when Germany could produce goods as cheaply as the Senator meant to indicate yesterday and flood this country, the time has already gone by.

The flood is no longer a menace. It was in the first place a flood of the imagination and not of substance. It carried no destitution in its pathway. It has not wrecked a single industry in this country. The imports from Germany are only about one-third of what they were before the war. Germany is struggling to-day as never in her history to regain her own business, to restore her destroyed industries. The Senator must know that. Every informed person in the United States does know it and the business people of the United States are acting on that information, acting on that understanding, but for the purpose of furnishing an excuse—not a reason but an excuse—for imposing these high taxes upon imports we are continually confronted by this German ghost.

Mr. President, I am not going to repeat or ask to have inserted in the RECORD again the information which I have heretofore presented on the subject, but I have some new information, some new calculations, which I do want to get into the RECORD at this time. I have here a comparison of the index numbers of wholesale prices in Germany in gold with the pre-war prices. I think every one will admit that prior to the war the industries of this country were prospering. They were not being destroyed by imports from Germany. We have also learned that conditions in Germany are rapidly changing, that wages have been increasing month by month, by leaps and bounds. The figures have been put into the RECORD. Other statistics as to the cost of various lines of industry in Germany have shown that the prices are gradually meeting the world gold level, and it must be so or else Germany would go bankrupt.

Let me take up the question of the gun which the Senator from Indiana exhibited yesterday to us in the Senate and which cost 90 cents. I would like to have the Senator from Indiana state, with his knowledge of hardware—and undoubtedly as a boy he had a shotgun or some other kind of gun and knows somewhat regarding its mechanism and the material that goes into the gun—how long it would take for any concern manufacturing that shotgun for 90 cents to go broke? How long would it require any country whose citizens manufactured such commodities at such prices to become bankrupt? The situation, if it ever existed in Germany, must have been merely temporary. It was not a thing to frighten anybody. We have no information here as to the number of such guns which were exported to the United States. We have heard of only one such gun. There could not have been many or else the price would have been brought down.

The table which I have here takes 100 marks as the index price of different lines of commodities in Germany in 1913. Allowance is made for the decline in the paper mark, that decline finally reaching 6,886 per cent; so that a little over sixty times as many marks are required to buy a dollar now as in 1913; but measured in that way and after allowing for that enormous discount, we find, for instance, that grain and potatoes in Germany are worth now and sell now for 90 per cent of the pre-war price. We all know that grain and foodstuffs have been controlled by the German Government, and that there is a governmental subsidy upon foodstuffs; but notwithstanding all that, measured in gold, with the German mark worth but one-sixtieth as much as before the war, that line of commodities is now on the basis of 90 per cent of the 1913 price. The price got down as low as 60 per cent. Fats, sugar, meat, and fish and other food products have not increased quite so much. They are only 77 per cent of the 1913 price. Spices and hops are up to 131 per cent; hides and leather to 124 per cent; textiles to 140 per cent; metals and petroleum, combined, to 92 per cent; coal and iron to 86 per cent; food, 18 commodities, 89 per cent; industrial goods, 20 commodities, 98 per cent; domestic goods, 16 commodities, 86 per cent; imported articles, 123 per cent; giving an average of 92 per cent, or within 8 per cent of the pre-war prices.

With that situation confronting us, I should like to know why we should be frightened, particularly when we realize that within the last few months prices have been continuing to rise. The last month for which I have statistics is the month of April, but I have not the slightest doubt those prices are much higher to-day.

Mr. President, I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Comparison of index numbers of wholesale prices in Germany in gold with pre-war prices.

Period.	Disparity of the paper mark.	Grain and potatoes.	Fat, sugar, meat, and fish.	Spices and hops.	Hides and leather.	Textiles.	Metals and petroleum.	Coal and iron.	Food—18 commodities.	Industrial goods—20 commodities.	Domestic goods—16 commodities.	Imported articles—22 commodities.	Official index all wares—38 commodities.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico, has he a comparison of the prices of those same articles in this country between 1913 and now?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I have.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May I ask the Senator from what authority this statement of facts and figures is secured?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. An expert from the Tariff Commission secured the information for me. I did not myself secure it independently, and it is made up on its face from the index figures.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand, these are figures of German wages. Is that true?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; they are figures relative to the prices of commodities in Germany.

Now, if the Senator from New Jersey will pardon me, I wish to reply further to the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana asked me if I had the same information regarding prices in the United States which I have presented as to prices in Germany. In reply I desire to say that I have here a comparison of index numbers of wholesale prices in gold in leading countries, based on 1913 equal 100, divided by dollar exchange premium. The figures for the United States are from the Bureau of Labor, beginning with January, 1920, down to and including May of this year.

For England the figures we have are those of the English statist. As I have said, the index number is 100, based on prices in 1913. The table shows the variations in England down to and including February of this year; for France, down to February of this year; for Italy, down to February; and for Germany, down to March, by months. For instance, the index number of the Bureau of Labor for the United States in January, 1920, was 233. That meant that general prices, according to that index number, in January, 1920, were 130 per cent higher than in 1913. That was almost the peak, but not quite, for in May of 1920 that index number had reached 247. It has been decreasing almost invariably since that time down to and including January of this year, when the number was 138. Since January of this year it has increased to 148.

Mr. President, I desire to make this observation, although I do not care to be diverted: We are now three and a half years after the war. The present tariff law is the law of 1913. It is what the Senator from Indiana yesterday denominated a free-trade tariff law. I did not agree with him then, and I do not agree with him now; but we are three and a half years after the war, and this country is not being flooded to-day with imports from Germany or anywhere else on earth. The wages in the United States to-day are high in most industries. They are higher than they were before the war. They have been higher than they are now.

That is the situation. That is under existing law. I do not believe that anybody is contending that American labor in the United States is being injured, at least seriously, by any imports that are coming into this country under existing law; and when the Senator from Indiana talks about this flood condition it is evident that the flood has not yet started if he applies it to imports. Nothing serious has happened.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator's figures simply demonstrate the benefit of a protective tariff. The thing which interests the laboring man is the purchasing power of his day's work. He does not care what he receives nominally; the only thing in which he is interested is the commodities his wage will buy. The man who is getting $3.50 in this country can buy seven times the quantity of tea and coffee and about five times the quantity of sugar and flour that the German workingman can buy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think the first statement of the Senator has any bearing upon his subsequent remarks.

Mr. McLEAN. I will try to make it clear to the Senator. In all noncompetitive articles that are purchased from the outside——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In the first place, the Senator admitted awhile ago that he did not know what the American wage earner was getting.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, the Senator need not get excited about that. If he is afraid to listen to my explanation, I will take my seat.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I always listen to the Senator from Connecticut with a great deal of interest.

Mr. McLEAN. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the German laborer when he buys noncompetitive articles from the outside has to pay for them in gold, so that when he buys tea or coffee, which come from distant countries, he has to pay in gold just as much as the laboring man in the United States. That is also practically true of flour and other basic commodities, to the prices of which the Senator has just referred. What I say is that the protective policy of this country which has sustained our scale of wages is of tremendous benefit to the American laboring man, because his day's work will buy from five to seven times what the day's work of the German laborer will buy, and the Senator's own figures have demonstrated it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the figures which I gave I do not interpret to demonstrate what the Senator from Connecticut seems to think they demonstrate; in fact, I do not think I have said anything which shows the amount of American wages, the amount of German wages, or what either one will buy.

Mr. McLEAN. But I have indicated what a day's wages will buy, and what a dollar will buy; and when the German laboring man reduces his wages to gold dollars, which he has got to do when he buys his goods from the outside, he is at a tremendous disadvantage. The Senator's figures show that, even with regard to wheat bread and sugar that he buys in Germany, he has to pay 90 per cent of the gold price outside, and he is getting from 5 to 6 cents an hour when the American laboring man is getting from 35 to 40 cents an hour.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The last statement of the Senator is certainly gratuitous, for we do not know what he is getting as yet, so far as any definite statistics are concerned.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from New Mexico iterates and reiterates that we do not know what the German laboring man is getting. I take my figures from the latest reports of the Department of Commerce, and I presume that department is as reliable as the source of the information furnished to the Senator from New Mexico. I suppose there is no question about the fact, for it can not be denied that labor in Germany does not get more than one-sixth of the wages in this country, estimated in gold. If the Senator can refute those figures I should like to have him do so. I am taking the Senator's own figures as to the price of goods.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What the Senator's argument would lead to is this, that a man with a dollar in Germany could buy more goods than he could buy in the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. Not at all; but he has got to have as many dollars to buy the same basic commodities as he has in the United States, and he gets 10 cents where the American gets a dollar for his day's work. That is why I say the figures of the Senator are a demonstration of the benefit of the protective policy; but the Senator wants us to submit to German importations, when they can result in nothing except the lowering of the wage scale in this country. There is no other way that we can hold our markets here unless we cut wages, and I do not favor that course.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to make this observation, although I do not care to be diverted: We are now three and a half years after the war. The present tariff law is the law of 1913. It is what the Senator from Indiana yesterday denominated a free-trade tariff law. I did not agree with him then, and I do not agree with him now; but we are three and a half years after the war, and this country is not being flooded to-day with imports from Germany or anywhere else on earth. The wages in the United States to-day are high in most industries. They are higher than they were before the war. They have been higher than they are now.

Mr. McLEAN rose.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I beg the indulgence of the Senator. I can not yield until I conclude what I have to say.

Mr. McLEAN. It is too bad——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I decline to yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not wonder that the Senator declines to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the situation. That is under existing law. I do not believe that anybody is contending that American labor in the United States is being injured, at least seriously, by any imports that are coming into this country under existing law; and when the Senator from Indiana talks about this flood condition it is evident that the flood has not yet started if he applies it to imports. Nothing serious has happened.

I agree with the statement which the Senator made yesterday that the situation is chaotic, that there is confusion, that nobody can tell just what the situation is in these foreign countries; but what I am contending for is that we have not yet felt any heavy hand of competition. All the goods which the Senator yesterday presented to us are selling at these enormous prices. They have not yet weighted down a single American price; at least, the Senator from Indiana yesterday did not know of any. He was asked to state the American price of the comparable article. He said he did not know; and so I have a right to say that the industries of this country are not being injured by any flood of importations, and that this so-called flood, this conjured-up flood, this disturbed state of mind should be allowed time to become normal before we undertake to legislate upon this subject.

Mr. President, I desire now to call attention to the other monthly variations in the index prices of the other countries. For February they show that the index price for England was 140.3; for France, 139.6; for Italy, 145; and for Germany, 82.5. I call attention further to the fact that in October of 1921 the German index price was 71.1, and that has increased since last October up to March of this year to 83.7.

Mr. President, I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have another table with special regard to minerals and metals. The paragraphs which we are considering necessarily involve the metal industry, and the prices of the different commodities which enter into metal products are given in dollars. The table gives the average 1913 price in dollars and the average March 1, 1922, price in dollars, and it shows the per cent of increase. It shows that the price of nut coal is now 19 per cent above the 1913 price; foundry coke is 5 per cent above; foundry pig iron is 13 per cent above; bar wrought iron is 45 per cent above; copper is three-tenths of 1 per cent lower than it was in 1913; tin is 7 per cent higher; zinc is 30 per cent higher; lead is 13 per cent higher; aluminum is 28 per cent higher; and nickel is 3 per cent higher.

I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

The movement of German wholesale prices.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in regard to labor, I desire to read some further observations, not as bearing upon the question of labor costs in marks or in dollars, but as bearing upon the general labor situation in Germany.

On the 21st of June of last year a representative of the United States Tariff Commission went to Germany to make an investigation. That was about two years and a half or more after the war; and here is what that report said:

The productive capacity of the large Siemens plant since the armistice has dropped as low as 51 per cent of that of peace times.

In the machine construction industry, the individual production is estimated at about 50 per cent of that of peace times.

That relates to the individual production as compared with peace times—only about 50 per cent.

One cause of the decrease is the change in labor regulations, as is also evident in the textile industry, where one workman is forbidden to handle more than two looms, as against four in times of peace (prewar). Factories are, to a large extent, compelled to employ a much greater number of workmen than they actually need, because of the Government's requirement of them to enroll certain numbers of unemployed or war-crippled persons. The discharge of unsuitable persons is rendered difficult by the demobilization regulations and by the powers vested in the workmen councils; then, again, the manufacturers hesitate to reduce their skilled force, even in the absence of orders, or they consider the retention of their workmen as a moral obligation. As a consequence, it often happens that the work is dragged out by the shortening of the hours of labor or the omission of shifts. All this tends to increase greatly the overhead expenses. In the iron industry (blast furnaces and foundries) only one-half of the possible production has been rendered, in the weaving industry about the same, and in the spinning mills about two-thirds.

Germany, as compared with countries which have been less affected by the war—and this comprises nearly all of them—has suffered great losses in skilled workers and qualified labor forces, and as a consequence their successors and the education of the latter have suffered. During the war many workers from the textile and other industries became coal miners or ammunition workers, and have therefore lost a great deal of their skill and special productive capacity.

Here is a report bearing upon the production cost as compared with the German wage. This article is a report of an interview with Doctor Striemer, the economic adviser of the German National Labor Federation, and is dated April 30, 1921. What I have is the report of that interview by a representative of the Tariff Commission. He says:

I mentioned to Doctor Striemer that the differences in wage rates in similar industries between Germany and the United States were being used as a basis for comparing roughly differences in cost of production of certain articles in the two countries—

That is just what the Senator from Indiana did yesterday—and requested his candid opinion regarding the accuracy of such comparisons. Without hesitancy he answered that these were not comparable figures because of the much greater production per worker—in some industries as high as and even over 100 per cent more—in America than in Germany and most European countries as well, thus increasing overhead charges enormously per unit produced in the latter countries, because the wage rates in Germany represent a minimum which is often far below the actual earnings per worker, and because there are many expenses incurred by the German manufacturers for labor which are not the case or in such degree in America.

Among the latter could be mentioned the three to four week vacation per worker each year with full pay, the innumerable instances where the worker takes off several hours or a half day or more to attend to some private affairs for which the employer can not deduct from the pay of the workman, the Government subsidies of food supplies, and the paying by the employer of workingmen's insurance premiums and labor required to keep account of same. Concerning insurance against old age and invalidism the employer pays one-half of the premium, against sickness one-third, and against accidents the employer must pay all.

These matters have been referred to heretofore in a general way, but seemingly they have not impressed themselves upon Senators who favor this bill. I have here a copy of the commerce report, gotten out by the Department of Commerce.

This article is a very illuminating one, and it is a recent one. It is dated June 19, 1922. This comes from an official source, and I would like for those Senators who heard the Senator from Indiana yesterday to listen to what the Department of Commerce has to say on this subject. The Senator from Indiana undertook to impress us with the fact that goods could be produced in Germany ten or fifteen times cheaper than in the United States. The Department of Commerce reviews the situation in Germany, and I am rather surprised that some one on the other side of the aisle has not been willing to bring to the Senate this recent official information.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the latest statement of the United States Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I prefer that the Senator should put that in at the conclusion of my remarks, if he will. I have no objection to his putting it in now, but I do not care to have it appear at this stage in my own remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not put it in the RECORD just now, but I want to say to the Senator in passing that the amount of wages paid in Germany in the chemical industry, as reported by the United States Department of Commerce, is so low that when I first received it I dared not use it until it had been checked up. I have this report now, and at some time, either to-day or at some future time when I am speaking, I shall put it into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the Senator will put it in the RECORD, because I am perfectly willing and glad to have all the real information obtainable before the Senate and before the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator believe that untrained technical workers, draftsmen, helpers, assistant photographers, and laboratory assistants are receiving $6.19 per month in Germany to-day?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been discussing that. I do not want to repeat, and I know the Senator from Utah does not want us to consume time unnecessarily, but I have pointed out time and again that, regardless of wages paid in Germany, they are not turning out the goods, and they are not flooding this country with exports. Unfortunately, the Senator from Utah was not here just a moment ago when I read a report of the Tariff Commission, made upon an investigation of some man representing American labor there, after interviewing economists in Germany as to the productiveness of American labor, who said that the question of the amount of money paid for labor was not comparable; in other words, that it was no index to the cost of production in Germany.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do know that a German can produce just as many chemicals in Germany as a workman in this country can. I know that if the salary is not one-tenth what it is in this country there must be a difference in the cost of producing goods in Germany and producing goods here.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Every time the Senator from Utah rises it is almost like turning a new page of an encyclopedia, and I am always glad to yield to him. He is always good-natured with me, and I am with him.

Mr. HEFLIN. A mutual admiration society.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; a mutual admiration society between the Senator from Utah and myself, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

We have this direct statement, that the productiveness of labor is not as great as that indicated by the wages. That statement was made, and I am going to make a further statement from official sources regarding it. I have read that statement here, and it is general information that we get from all our reading on the subject.

I want to get before the Senate this latest report of the Department of Commerce. It does not give the wage in dollars, but is does bear upon the effectiveness of German labor at the wage paid. It reads:

German industry is facing a discouraging outlook. Production costs are affected by rising coal prices, wage increases, and by the 25 per cent freight rate increase of June 1, which is doubtless to be followed by an additional advance on July 1; also the prices of necessary raw material show little favorable effect from the slight improvement in exchange. The forced loan will doubtless fall heavily on industry, and any later supplementary taxation will further increase production costs. On the other hand, there is noticed a decrease of foreign orders and many cancellations of contracts, which may be explained by the approach of German export prices to world-market prices.

If commodities can be produced in Germany at any such prices as indicated in the speech of the Senator from Indiana yesterday, why are they canceling orders?

The approach to world-market prices is particularly marked in the textile, steel, hollow glass, enamel ware, agricultural implements, and tool industries.

I make the observation here now, because we are considering a matter involving steel production, that according to this statement, dated the 19th day of this month, the cost of those commodities is approaching world prices, and orders are being canceled.

The impossibility of quoting firm prices for future deliveries is also a handicap.

Heretofore I have stated, and produced evidence to substantiate the statement, that in trade in Germany there is no longer an opportunity to enter into a contract for the future delivery of these commodities at a fixed price. The German Government has interfered, and one dealing with Germany now can not know what his goods are going to cost until they are actually delivered.

The competition of an increasing number of foreign manufactured products in the German market is prevented only by recent increases in import duties and by a tendency toward a stricter enforcement of the import embargo.

Germany is troubled about imports, and is increasing her duties to keep out competition. That must mean competition in various lines of industry, in steel products, in textiles, in leather, and other lines which can be produced and sold in Germany in competition with German products. I read further:

It is increasingly realized in Germany that an improvement in the external value of the mark or even a stabilization at its present level, whether due to an international loan or other causes, may bring an industrial slump. An improvement in the mark would tend to restore the confidence of the German public in the soundness of their currency, but this added stability would be a high price to pay for an industrial depression of unknown duration. The domestic overbuying of goods with intrinsic value would seriously jeopardize export prospects in many instances and end in a subnormal domestic demand.

The illusory nature of the present industrial activity based on half speculative domestic buying and valuta dumping abroad, is becoming increasingly apparent; temporary advantages of fresh currency depreciation are progressively less effective.

Mr. President, we have heard much about the depreciation of the German mark. It has been pointed out to us time and again that, owing to its depreciated currency, Germany can outproduce and outsell the world, and yet not a man has risen in this Chamber to advise us to depreciate our currency. If depreciated currency is a good thing, if it is going to make industry prosperous, if it is going to give us world markets, why does not some one rise and advise us to depreciate our currency?

The reason is, as I have heretofore stated, that a depreciated currency can only be an impetus to trade while it is depreciating. When it gets down to the bottom, under the law of supply and demand, a natural equilibrium is found, and prices are restored to world conditions, as any economist knows.

I mention again that that is only evidence that this situation in Germany is ephemeral, is temporary, and if it is not hurting American industry during this temporary period, during the time the currency is being deflated, what normal mind would fear future competition, when prices in Germany are seeking this great world level?

So the Department of Commerce uses the expression, "The illusory nature of the present industrial activity." Other conditions in Germany are mentioned. I read further from the report:

German foreign trade figures for April show the largest adverse balance in paper marks yet recorded; imports (amounting to 2,888,900 metric tons) were valued at 28,261,000,000 paper marks, while exports (amounting to 2,176,000 tons) were valued at 22,995,000,000 paper marks—making an import surplus of 5,266,000,000 marks.

Now, if Germany was flooding the world with her products, if German industries were active and productive to anything like the extent which Senators would have us believe, why does not Germany have at least a balance of trade in her favor? But in April of this year the balance of trade against Germany was 5,266,000,000 marks.

Exports which showed a decrease by weight in April from the previous month were as follows: Dyes, 10 per cent—

We have heard a great deal here about the world being flooded with dyes from Germany. In April the export of dyes had been decreased 10 per cent—iron and steel goods, 5 per cent; paper, 16 per cent; pottery, 13 per cent; glass, 29 per cent; musical instruments and toys, 7 per cent; cotton textiles, 11 per cent; rubber goods, 20 per cent; machinery, 2 per cent; electrotechnical goods, 22 per cent.

In that one month those were the decreases in exports from Germany. There were a few increases, and in order to get in the whole article I shall read those:

Increases by weight from March to April were seen in heavy chemicals, 36 per cent; zinc and zinc alloys, 41 per cent; leather and leather goods, etc., 26 per cent.

Imports of agricultural and horticultural products amounted to 474,000 metric tons as against 390,000 in April and 190,000 in February.

Coming now to coal, which is a necessity in the production of steel and iron and of all the commodities made from steel and iron, the article proceeds:

The Ruhr coal production for 19 working days in May amounted to 5,600,000 tons; Ruhr coke came to 1,475,000 tons. Better transportation facilities reduced pithead coke. Upper Silesian coal production was somewhat larger in May than in April. The imports of British coal into Germany are increasing, being estimated at 1,000,000,000 marks in May.

What Senator on the other side of the Chamber has dared to suggest that Germany was an importer of coal, a necessity for every one of her industrial factories? It is known that when Germany imports coal it must be paid for on a gold basis and in these enormously depreciated marks. Instead of being an advantage as to her imports, the depreciation is an enormous disadvantage. But who on the other side of the Chamber has ever thought of suggesting that this depreciated currency had its disadvantages?

The heavy metal industries are still embarrassed by the coal shortage and further reductions in the coke allotments to certain foundries; a shortage of pig iron makes imports necessary. The slowness in steel deliveries to consuming industries, including the agricultural implements industry, is causing long delays in selling contracts; this is making a bad impression on foreign customers. The foreign demand for rolled goods is quieter, but somewhat better in the case of shapes and bars. Belgian and British competition is preventing the export of thin black sheets, and wire rod exports are threatened. The hardware and cutlery industries are embarrassed by a scarcity of material, and the former reports numerous canceled contracts.

That is the hardware industry.

The hardware and metal finishing industries generally report a slackness in new orders and a heavy slump in export demands.

Where is the evidence of this flood?

Cotton spinning is less active, but the slump is not yet affecting weaving mills, which anticipate being able to continue the present rate of production for several months on the basis of old orders. Bremen cotton stocks on the 26th of May amounted to 261,000 bales, as compared with 328,000 on the 5th of May. British competition is increasing in cotton yarns from Nos. 60 to 160. Woolen mills are fully occupied, although new orders are decreasing. The linen industry is facing a consumers' strike on account of prices, with little prospect of export.

Yesterday the Senator from Indiana displayed to us some articles of linen, but the export trade from Germany in linen, according to this report, is threatened with competition from somewhere else. If the exports be threatened, it means that the cost of production in Germany can not be much less than it is somewhere else.

Uncertainty in the textile industry is affecting the domestic dye market and serious competition seems to be increasing abroad. The production of heavy chemicals, cement, and plate glass is limited by the coal shortage. The hollow glass and woodworking industries report a decline in export demand, with similar tendencies in the domestic market. The marketing of lumber from East Prussia is threatened by new freight rates.

An increase in the price of coal is reported to be imminent as a result of the new demand. The maximum inland prices of pig iron, in paper marks per metric ton, effective on June 1, were as follows:

I shall not give them, because I have not the comparative figures for them. I do not know with what they compare for previous months. It gives also the price of copper sheets.

Now, in regard to the rise in the cost of living:

The Frankfurter Zeitung wholesale price index (77 commodities based on 100 for June, 1920) rose from 585 on May 1 to 606 on June 1, the latter being sixty-seven times the pre-war figure for this index.

Senators will recall that during the month of May the German mark was worth just about one sixty-seventh of its parity in gold, and here we have it stated that the cost of living in Germany has risen until, according to this authority, it is sixty-seven times the pre-war figure, measured in marks, almost fully equalizing the difference in parity of exchange.

When I am told that German wages to-day are only one-tenth or one-fifteenth or one-sixth of the wages in the United States, and when I am told that the prices of living in Germany are sixty-seven times as high as they were prior to the war, measured in marks, I do not believe it. They can not live on any such basis.

The Government cost of living index (based on 100 in July, 1914) for May was 3,462, having increased from 3,175 on April 1 and from 1,640 on January 1.

There is a rise from the 1st of January to May from 1,640 marks to 3,462 marks.

Through 1921 the increase had been steady from 944 in January to 1,550 in December. The foodstuffs index for May showed 4,680, having been given a month before as 4,386—

An increase in the one month of about 300 marks in the value of the index number—and in January of this year as 2,219.

More than doubled since the 1st of January of this year.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Do not the figures given by the Senator simply mean a decline in the gold value of the German mark? The Senator speaks about the rise in the cost of living as measured in marks. What is the increase in the cost of living as measured in gold? Is there any such increase?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad the Senator made his inquiry, because it is very pertinent and important to the application of what I have been reading. I will state to the Senator that the German mark last fall reached its lowest period. It was about October, I believe, when the German mark got down to the point where it took about 300 of them to be worth a dollar, or one-third of 1 cent each, speaking in round numbers. That was the value of the mark then. It has remained about that figure since. It has varied a little, not materially. Notwithstanding the mark has remained stationary, prices of these goods have increased the number of marks which I have just read. So that it shows that the mark is no longer declining, but the prices of commodities, measured in marks, are rising.

Necessarily, as I have previously pointed out, there must come a time when the prices must reach the same level or equilibrium with world prices of commodities; and so far as the cost of living is concerned it has just about reached there now. Measured in marks, it is sixty-seven times what it was prior to the war, and the parity of exchange is about 68 at the present time.

On May 1 the number of organized laborers receiving unemployment allowances was 51,417, which shows the remarkable drop from the numbers reported for April 1 (171,000) and March 1 (209,000). The industrial boom indicated by this rapidly decreasing unemployment figure in March, April, and May is coming to an end; the minister of labor recently informed the Reichstag that this was the case and that serious unemployment might soon result. A compromise with which the four months' strike of south German metal workers was ended furnishes an important precedent by establishing a 47-hour week. Strikes seem to have been a trifle more numerous in May than in April, which had shown decreased unrest as compared with March. In the month just ended there was a brief strike in the weaving industry in Saxon Thuringia, a wage strike in the Magdeburg sugar refineries, and a strike in the mines and smelters of the Harz affecting about 5,000 men.

* * * * * * *

Postal rates are to be increased on July 1 by 35 to 50 per cent. After the increase in postal and telegraph rates on January 1 a decided falling off was noticed in the use of these services.

Mr. President, what a picture! It seems to me that anyone who will glance at that picture will not be thinking about the flood of imports from Germany; but when it is understood that Germany is one of the best customers the United States has ever had in Europe let us look at another picture and remember that the farmers of the country want to find a market for their surplus products. We can not ignore either one of those pictures. Senators on the other side of the Chamber are continually exhibiting the one picture; they have been misinterpreting that picture; they have not yet seen the full scope of the picture; but the picture which represents the prosperity of the great farming interests of the country has been deliberately and willfully ignored and put into the cellar.

Mr. President, we wonder why it is that there could be such a disparity in the selling price of these German commodities in the United States and the purchase price in Germany. Yesterday when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was addressing the Senate, and some days ago when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the chairman of the Finance Committee, made a like exhibition, I tried to get information from those Senators regarding the actual cost of those articles in Germany. Yesterday I challenged the Senator from Indiana to corroborate his statement that the gun which was produced here was bought in Germany for 90 cents. He has not yet furnished any information to that effect. As I stated then, the truth of the situation is that those goods are purchased in Germany for so many marks, and when they were exported to the United States the value of the mark as of that day was taken as the basis of the foreign cost for purposes of taxation, for purposes of levying the duty. That is the law. In the emergency tariff law we enacted a provision which required that that be done. If the German mark had depreciated between the time the importer purchased the goods or contracted for the goods, it would show a cost price very much less than the actual cost. That was so regarding many of the items which were exhibited here by the Senator from North Dakota. When we were discussing the question of cutlery we were confronted with just such statements as that. We were then told how cheaply razors were bought abroad and how cheaply knives were bought abroad, and specific instances were given. I wanted to find out whether or not that was the actual situation. So I called upon the people who did the importing, and I have information direct from them regarding it. It presents just that situation.

Here is a letter which I have received from an importer and manufacturer of cutlery. The letter is addressed to me, and the writer says:

Senator McLEAN stated, as is recorded on page 8407 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 62, covering the proceedings of June 8, 1922, that item 665, which we imported, costs, landed in the United States, $1.12 per dozen. These figures that Senator McLEAN gave are taken from the Reynolds report, which is absolutely out of date. The landed price of this imported knife to-day would be very close to $2 per dozen.

The selling price of the comparable domestic article, which, as a matter of fact, is our No. 62963½, made by our own factory—the Camillus Cutlery Co.—is $3.82½, not $4.67, per dozen, as indicated by the Senator; so that the difference between the domestic and imported article is not nearly so great as the Senator would like to have you believe.

On page 8451 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, covering the proceedings of June 9, the writer notices that Senator McLEAN asks the percentage of merchandise handled by the importers that is imported and the percentage manufactured in this country. As far as we are concerned the percentage is about 50–50, but it might interest Senator McLEAN to know that we have over half a million dollars invested in our American pocketknife factory at Camillus, N. Y., which incidentally is operating full time with its full complement of men despite the fact that we have not yet gotten the protection which the McCumber-Fordney bill desires to afford us.

That letter does not contain information which I thought it did, but it comes from a man who is not only an importer but a manufacturer, who carries on just about as much business in one capacity as in the other.

Here is a letter dated June 13, addressed to me by H. Boker & Co., to whom reference was made in the discussion, I believe, on the 12th of June, in a colloquy between the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and myself. The letter reads:

I have read with a great deal of interest the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the cutlery schedules and want to assure you that it was furthest from my mind to deceive you as regards the landed cost of any item. I refer particularly to razors, No. 101.

Senator McLEAN asks why I should deem it worth while to deceive you. The facts, as the Senator states, as to the cost of this razor in August, 1921, are correct. As to the cost of the same razor on an invoice of April 28, 1922, he is also correct, that it was cheaper than in August, 1921, with this difference—that the razor cost us $3.79 in Germany, and not $3.15, as he states. The reason for this is, that we had orders placed at firm prices, and as the value of the mark in August, 1921, was $0.0119 against a mark cost of $0.0035 in April, 1922, this accounts for difference in the cost and is due to the factories having accepted our orders at firm prices, not appreciating at that time that the mark would drop so much.

There is a drop in the price of the mark from nearly a cent and a quarter to one-third of a cent, and according to the law the duty would be paid on the assumption that the mark cost one-third of a cent instead of about a cent and a quarter, a difference of nearly 400 per cent. That explains why and how these great percentages appear in the exhibition which was staged here by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the committee. It was because of a depreciation in marks; so it becomes necessary in each of those cases to know when the contract was made, the price of the mark in exchange upon that day, and the difference between that time and the day of export. It was that information which I sought from the Senator from Indiana as well as the Senator from North Dakota, and neither one of them had any such information; but it was absolutely essential to give any worth to the side show which was being pulled off here in the Senate Chamber.

We have always contended with our factory in Germany that our goods were placed at firm prices. They, on their part, while shipping some items at firm prices, in some instances have cabled us that they would have to get certain advances on some items, in which case we always consented to their shipping the goods at the advances. This is borne out by the statement later in the letter regarding cost of knife No. 6066, which in March was one price and in April materially higher.

But the important point is not what goods have cost us in the past, but what they will cost us in future, and this razor will cost us on any future order that we may place $11.48, landed in New York, duty paid.

That is, present duty, whereas under the illustration the same razor was landed at $3.79; but on future orders it will be landed at $11.48.

Why is it not important that those facts be known? Why do we not find out what the price of those shotguns is in the United States to-day? Why is not some reason given why this country is not being flooded with those commodities? Is it possible that Senators of the United States will presume upon the ignorance of the people of the United States? If not, why do we have such side shows pulled off here in the Senate Chamber?

The American comparable razor is sold to-day at $11 per dozen, and it is not a cheap article; it is rated in quality as good as any razor made in America. I am sending you a sample, which you can compare with the No. 101 that you have. You will note that this American razor is a full hollow-ground razor, well finished, and any number of wholesale houses who handle this razor can substantiate what I say, i. e., that it is a first-quality razor and rates with any of the high-grade razors made in this country.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN quotes an American razor of which the wholesale selling price is $17.05. I do not know the razor that he used for comparison, but I do know that the sample that we sent you ranks with any other American razor, and therefore it is more than likely that the price of $17.05 was a quotation during the high war times and not the price to-day.

I will now take up knife No. 6066.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator leaves the item of razors, let me ask him if his correspondent explains why the future invoices of the razors will be at approximately $11?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My correspondent had stated that in the letter which I produced and put into the RECORD the day that the Senator from Connecticut and I were discussing the matter. The reason he gave was that under a law of Germany, after the 15th of May, I believe, no goods could be billed out of Germany to this country in marks, but they had to be billed out in dollars, and that the old contracts which had been made, if firm contracts—that is, fixed contracts, with no chance to vary with the increase in price—could be billed up to the 1st of September of this year; but by that measure the price from that time was fixed at 25 per cent above the pre-war price, in most instances, and 40 per cent above the pre-war price in others; so the whole matter was gone into in the discussion at that time.

I will now take up knife No. 6066. Senator McLEAN states that according to the Reynolds report the landed cost for this knife at that time was $5.75 per dozen. I will take for granted that it is correct, though I have not checked up this figure. The Senator goes on and states that in April of this year this same knife costs $2.55 landed cost. Both of the above two figures are, of course, without duty. The facts in the case are, that on our invoice of March 27, 1922, we did receive some of these knives at approximately this landed cost of $2.55 without duty, but on invoice of April 28, 1922, we received some of these same knives on which the landed cost without duty was $4.27. This difference in one month is due to advances that we had to pay and also due to the mark being approximately $0.0033 on the March invoice and $0.0035 on the April invoice.

This only bears out what I mentioned to you that goods keep advancing from Germany, and I want to impress you further with the fact that any orders that we may place will only be filled at the gold value of the mark plus 25 per cent, which would make this knife cost $8.87.

The Senator further stated that a comparable American knife was being sold at $13. We do not know to which American knife he referred, but we make this same knife, equal in finish, etc., in our own American factory, and we sell it to-day at $11.25 per dozen. This comparative figure will show you that even the present rate of duty would only leave us a fair profit if we sell it at the price of the American comparable article. To me it seems that the selling prices which were quoted by the Senators on the Republican side are those that they got for goods some time ago, and I think that they should further investigate the American prices that they have.

The prices that I quote you are absolutely authentic, and our American knives are rated with other first-class American goods.

I will not go into the matters of scissors any further than to say that there is a big difference in the quality and finish of scissors.

Then he proceeds to discuss shears and some other items, and so on, which I will not take up the time at present to read; but I ask that the entire letter may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. LADD in the chair]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

H. BOKER & CO. (INC.),
MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,
CUTLERY, HARDWARE, STEEL,
101–103 Duane Street, New York, N. Y., June 13, 1922.

Senator A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read with a great deal of interest the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the cutlery schedules, and want to assure you that it was furthest from my mind to deceive you as regards the landed cost of any item. I refer particularly to razors, No. 101.

Senator McLEAN asks why I should deem it worth while to deceive you. The facts, as the Senator states, as to the costs of this razor in August, 1921, are correct. As to the cost of the same razor on an invoice of April 28, 1922, he is also correct that it was cheaper than in August, 1921, with this difference, that the razor cost us $3.79 in Germany and not $3.15, as he states. Senator FRELINGHUYSEN quotes an American razor of which the wholesale selling price is $17.05. I do not know the razor that he used for comparison, but I do know that the sample that we sent you ranks with any other American razor, and therefore it is more than likely that the price of $17.05 was a quotation during the high war times and not the price to-day.

I will now take up knife No. 6066. Senator MCLEAN states that according to the Reynolds report the landed cost for this knife at that time was $5.75 per dozen. I will take for granted that it is correct, though I have not checked up this figure. Then the Senator goes on and states that in April of this year this same knife cost $2.55, landed cost. The prices that I quote you are absolutely authentic, and our American knives are rated with other first-class American goods.

I will not go into the matter of scissors any further than to say that there is a big difference in the quality and finish of scissors.

Shears: When the Senator from Connecticut states that a duty on shears is necessary because the Germans would manufacture them and shut up the American factories the facts are as you stated; the process of manufacturing is totally different, and if the Germans had been able to manufacture them is it not reasonable to suppose that they would have started in pre-war times? Government reports, as you quote, show that shears have been exported in large quantities to Europe for years.

Knives, No. 5611: The Senator from Connecticut calls attention to knives, No. 5611, which is one of our make, and states that the American selling price of a comparable article is $24.50. The selling price to-day of the comparable article which we manufacture is $19 per dozen, and we will be glad to take orders for them at this figure. Here also it might be well for the Senator from Connecticut to investigate the prices of comparable American goods.

In reference to the cost of this knife, No. 5611, he states that the landed cost was $10.20 without duty, which is also not in keeping with the facts; the landed cost in August, 1921, was $11.37 without duty.

In reference to the other numbers that are quoted, Messrs. A. Kastor & Bros., who are large importers of these cheaper grades of goods, will send you further information.

The Senator from Connecticut assumes that we are owners of the German factory. What his basis is for expressing this opinion on the floor of the Senate I do not know, but the facts in the case are that the family of Boker is a large one in Germany, and they are in different lines of manufacturing. The firm of Heinrich Boker & Co., Solingen, has absolutely no interest whatever in our concern, nor have we any interest whatever in their concern. We are the United States agents for them, and we must buy goods at the best prices that we can from them. When the Senator implies that it was to my advantage to deceive you he is making rather a broad assertion, which he can not justify in any way.

The Senator further states that it would be interesting to know what proportion of our business was imports and what proportion was American goods. The percentage of our German importations of our business last year was 15 per cent.

The Senator further states that American factories are running on half time and with only a skeleton force. Both of our factories are running full time, one of them with a larger number of employees than in pre-war times and the other with about two-thirds of our pre-war force.

The Senator from Connecticut further states that these importers control the situation and can make the prices on the foreign goods. That is also rather a broad assertion. When the German Government passes a law that compels the invoicing of goods in dollars at the advances that I have mentioned to you, i. e., ranging from 25 to 40 per cent over the gold mark value, surely no one in any seriousness would state that we here as American importers could compel the German Government to make such prices as suited us.

The statement of the importers as to the conditions and as to what they consider a fair rate of duty is based upon the knowledge of actual conditions and with the thought uppermost in their mind that our American interests must have ample protection. Of the three firms who signed the statement one has $1,500,000 invested in American plants and one of the others well over $500,000, the third has a small capital investment, but they are making American scissors only.

I will be very glad to come down to Washington at any time that you wish to see me to still further clear up any doubt that you may have in your mind as to my intention when I gave you this information, and also to give you any further information that you would want. Mr. Kastor is also prepared to come down at any time that you wish. They are the largest importers of the cheaper grades, while we import almost altogether the higher grades, so that if we both come down we could without doubt give you any additional information that you will want.

Yours very truly,

EDW. GRAFMUELLER.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have put those letters in the RECORD for the purpose of showing just how these matters have operated, why this disparity exists, and so forth, and why there is the necessity of ascertaining the dates and circumstances surrounding each one of these purchases.

I have here an illustration that has been prepared to show in simplified form just how important these matters are which I have been discussing. It was prepared by one of our assistants in the consideration of this bill, and it is entitled:

How an apparent spread between foreign prices and domestic retail prices of merchandise imported from Germany or other low-currency countries may occur.

During February the New York exchange value of the German mark was slightly over 2 cents—

That was in February, 1921.

while during November of the same year it was about one-third of a cent.

It is well-known that it takes from 6 to 12 months after date of order or contract to get deliveries in Germany.

The customs law requires that duty shall be paid on the foreign market value of imported merchandise on the date of exportation.

Invoices for goods ordered in February, 1921, at 2 cents for the mark and exported in November at the one-third cent mark would be converted into American money at the New York customhouse on the basis of one-third cent for each mark, instead of 2 cents, the actual purchase price.

Example: Supposing an importer ordered a bill of goods from Germany in February, 1921, amounting to 1,000 marks, on which the duty is 50 per cent ad valorem, these goods to be manufactured and delivered for export to the United States in November.

This importer would immediately buy exchange from his New York bank to cover this transaction, paying for same 2 cents for each mark or an amount of $20, not including bank charges. All regular importers do this to eliminate chances of loss in a sudden rise in exchange; in other words, they do not gamble on exchange. On the basis of the 2-cent mark the importer makes all his calculations, including duty, to arrive at his selling price in the United States as follows:

Foreign cost, 1,000 marks at 2 cents	$20.00
Freight and insurance, 5 per cent	1.00
Duty, 50 per cent	10.00
Overhead and profit on cost, 50 per cent	15.50
Selling price	46.50

NOTE.—It is doubtful whether or not importations of the class of goods as exhibited by Senator MCCUMBER could be handled with success by a department store on an overhead and profit of only 50 per cent.

That shows how those goods would cost actually $20, but if we take the date of export we find that it would be a third of a cent for each 100 marks, and that would reduce that price by a percentage which I believe appears later, and I will read that so as to have it stated accurately.

Assuming the above goods were delivered and exported from Germany during November, 1921, or thereabouts, when the value of the mark declined to one-third of a cent.

In due time the goods would arrive at the customhouse in New York accompanied by an invoice for 1,000 marks. The United States appraiser would examine and appraise the merchandise, note on the invoice that 1,000 marks was the correct foreign market value on date of exportation, and return said invoice to the collector of customs for liquidation.

The collector of customs would convert the 1,000 marks at the New York rate of exchange as of the date of exportation, viz, one-third of a cent, and the records of the customhouse would show that the goods cost $3.30, notwithstanding that the importer contracted for the goods when the mark was worth 2 cents, and that his actual first cost was $20.

The importer's selling price, as calculated above, of $46.50, was based on actual figures; the customhouse records only show the legal value for duty purposes of $3.30, an apparent but not actual spread of about 1,400 per cent. This probably happened thousands of times during 1921, when the mark took a sudden and sharp decline, and while the importer would enjoy some advantage by reason of having the dutiable value based on the lower rate of exchange it is obvious that the spread would not approach 1,400 per cent.

Senator MCCUMBER in stating the foreign costs of the articles exhibited gave the gold value as converted by the customs, and did not state the value in foreign currency as shown on the invoice or the rate of exchange paid by the importer.

It is evident, therefore, that the majority of his figures as to foreign costs are inaccurate.

Evidently that is just what caused the exhibition here yesterday; but it is apparent to anyone that without further information this side show had no significance whatever; unless we know when the goods were contracted for, when the foreign exchange was bought, when the goods were exported, and the gold value of the currency at the date of the exportation. Unless we know those things, then these figures amount to nothing; they mean nothing. Yet Senators deliberately go about that sort of thing, and we were advised yesterday by the Senator from Indiana that this was only one side show, and that there were others to come. I wonder how long the patience of the country is going to be trifled with with such folly.

Mr. President, it is evident that much confusion exists among the proponents of this bill, and I am going to read an editorial taken from the New York Herald to-day bearing upon the situation. I call to mind that while the New York Herald is generally denominated an independent paper, the country aligns it as a Republican paper. This is the leading editorial. We recall that the other night the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] made an extended speech advocating the extension of the Tariff Commission, and that the tariff be taken out of politics. The Senator from New Jersey at that time expressed the view, notwithstanding the fact that he is a member of the Finance Committee, that no scientific basis underlay this bill; that it was conceived in uncertainty and was produced in confusion. The comment of the New York Herald seems to me somewhat timely, and I read it:

SELF-CONFESSED IGNORANCE.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey, had a good deal to do with making the McCumber tariff duties in the Senate Finance Committee, so he speaks from knowledge and experience when he tells how the measure was put together. And Senator FRELINGHUYSEN is honest enough to declare in effect that the men who made the schedules did not know what they were doing. No other conclusion is to be drawn from his admission that "the schedules were written without adequate knowledge of the facts."

This is exactly what the economists, business men, and newspapers of the country and the clear thinkers in Congress itself object to about the slipshod, bungled thing which the Fordney-McCumber tariff makers have ventured to foist upon the country as a fitting exemplar of the American tariff system.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN says, however, that this blunderbuss tariff ought to be passed none the less as the best the lawmakers could do in their ignorance. After that, he urges, let men who know something about the business and economic conditions of the country and of the world get on the job at once of trying to take the ignorance and mischief out of the measure, putting in what is reasonable and right.

But American common sense will answer that since a Senator who helped to make the tariff measure admits it is an ignorant and dangerous botch, the thing to do with it is not to turn it loose on the country, with all its capacity for harm, but to modify its excesses until it has been made safe for the country.

If the other tariff makers realize as Senator FRELINGHUYSEN realizes—and they can hardly fail to see what he both sees and acknowledges—that they did not know what they were doing when they patched up their tariff monstrosity, they can cut or postpone every inordinate duty that is a reckless experiment until they get their tariff measure into shape where it looks at least like something sane and safe. After that, the expert work by men who do know what they are about can begin to make a tariff that the public can accept and the country thrive under. But take no perilous chances now.

The language used in that editorial is, I believe, stronger than anything I have said regarding this bill. It comes from a newspaper of the country which is recognized as one of the leading Republican inclined newspapers of the country. The same views have been expressed in practically every Republican newspaper of importance in the country. There are a few exceptions, but the New York Tribune, the New York Journal of Commerce, the Chicago Tribune, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the independent press of the country generally, quotations from which have been read into the RECORD at different times, all condemn this measure, and to call it a monstrosity is a mild expression compared with some of those which have been used in these Republican papers. If there is a single Republican paper in all the land which has come out and championed this bill I have no knowledge concerning it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the great champion of this bill in the Senate aside from the chairman of the Finance Committee, has admitted, in so many words, that the press of the country is against the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator virtually did that immediately on his return from Indiana. On the 5th of this month the Senator sounded the alarm, said the country had been heard from, and that they were determined henceforth to defend this bill; that only the criticism had been carried to the country, and that they were going to defend it. What kind of a defense do they make?

What did the distinguished Senator from Indiana, as the star of this performance, do in his first speech, in which he said he was going to defend this bill? Senators who listened to that speech, and those who have read it since, know that he did not mention a single paragraph in the bill, and did not undertake to justify a single rate.

The situation becomes further desperate, and he comes before the Senate again and produces another side show. He does not mention a single rate. He does not defend a rate or a paragraph in the bill. He puts before the Senate a situation which is at least folly, if not to be condemned.

I do not attribute to the distinguished Senator from Indiana other than the best of motives; yet, possessing the little information which he furnished us yesterday, no person of sound reasoning or common understanding can conclude that the object was any other than to deceive the American people.

On the question of wages, which I discussed earlier this afternoon, the Senator told us that the average wage in five key industries of the country is $1.25 an hour and that the wages in Germany are only one-fifteenth of that, and everybody who observes passing events at all knows that the only effect of that would be to deceive.

The Senator yesterday took occasion to refer to the press of the country. He said:

I have as great admiration for the New York Times as a newspaper as anybody else, but it is an international paper. It believes in these importing houses. It is opposed fundamentally to the establishment of American industry.

Mr. President, that is another great independent newspaper of the country. I suppose there is not another paper in all the land which so enjoys the absolute impartial confidence of the people as does the New York Times. That is what the Senator from Indiana has to say, but, mind you, from what follows it does not appear that he was singling out the New York Times alone in condemnation. He was using it as an illustration of a corrupt press, but I do not believe that he can ever convince the American people that the metropolitan and trusted press of this country is corrupt. He said that an advertisement had been offered which the New York Times declined to accept because it violated a rule of the trade. I shall not take the time to discuss that now, but from the bare fact that the New York Times, according to its business rule, a rule which I believe has obtained in every other newspaper of the country, refused to accept an advertisement because it violated one of its rules, the Senator from Indiana chooses to condemn the paper in this language.

I quote that—

Referring to quotations he had read from an advertising agency—

only for the purpose of showing the strangle hold the retail and importing establishments of New York have on some of these very great publications and newspapers.

Previously the Senator had used this language:

Will the great New York Times, one of the ablest and strongest papers published and edited in all the world, publish the truth about these things? No; it will not. Why? Because James McCutcheon & Co. will not permit them to do it. That is precisely the reason.

Mr. President, I am not surprised that Senators who assume the rôle of defending the bill will try to find something beyond its pages to use for that purpose. When the Senator from Indiana returned from Indianapolis, having found that the people of the country were condemning the bill, having found that the press of the country, the Republican press, was condemning the bill, there were just one or two things to do in order to defend it. They had to divert attention from the bill itself, and they had to discredit the American press in order to defend it.

The American press had been condemning the bill. It is still doing it. So, as I have said, it became necessary to divert the attention of the American people from it. Here is how the press of the country views the bill, and it is how the people of the Nation feel about it. I read only from the headlines of an article which appeared yesterday in the Journal of Commerce, published in New York, a great paper, but which the Senator from Indiana would say was controlled by some advertiser. I do not wonder that Senators will resort to these subterfuges. They thus try to divert the attention of the American people. They try to discredit the American press, and, as I think, because it is telling the truth. Just let me read the headlines here regarding the bill:

Beneficiaries very hostile to new tariff.

Those who are supposed to be the beneficiaries are very hostile to the new tariff.

Unprecedented situation is found to exist among protected industries. Manufacturers foresee harm to themselves. Consumers silent but hostile. Farmer realizes he has been sold. Exporter discouraged over home situation.

That is the picture on which the American public gaze. Even those who are supposed to be the beneficiaries of the bill are opposing it. Why? Because they live in the present hour. They realize conditions as they are to-day. They know that there has been painted by the war a new picture. The economic situation to-day is nothing similar to what it was prior to the war. At that time we were a great debtor nation. We had to export our surplus to pay our debts abroad. To-day we are the greatest creditor nation on earth. We are producing the greatest surplus of any nation on earth. We must find a market for it. Our manufacturers are producing vast surpluses of their products. They have been the so-called beneficiaries of a protective tariff in the past, but when it is realized that they are exporters, that almost 50 per cent of the exports of the country are manufactured products, it can then be understood why the so-called beneficiaries of a protective tariff are now disgusted with it and feel that it will injure them and destroy their prosperity in their export trade.

The farmers of the country are supposed to be beneficiaries of the bill. I wish my good friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] were here, who assumes to be the spokesman on the floor for the farmer. According to this headline the farmer feels that he has been sold by the bill, and so he has. We passed an emergency tariff bill putting a duty upon agricultural products, and with the exception of hides the tariff remains upon the statute books to-day. The tariff on hides was put there by the Senate upon my suggestion, but the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in the conference succeeded in having it eliminated. Mark you, I doubt if th

Senator from Idaho knows yet that the emergency tariff act is a permanent law of the land and that it will remain in force if it is not repealed by the pending measure.

So far as wool is concerned, the present law gives greater protection to the woolgrowers than does the pending measure. As to wheat, the present law has a duty higher than that proposed in this bill. There is also a duty upon meat. When he considers that the present law, the emergency tariff law, is to be repealed by this measure, and when he further considers that everything which he buys is to be increased by the duties provided in this measure—that the prices of horseshoe nails, horseshoes, harness buckles, wagon tires, barbed wire, the hardware he uses in his house, the textiles that he uses to clothe his family, are all increased by the duties provided in this bill—then does the farmer realize that instead of being benefited by this measure he is being sold.

Mr. President, when we consider the first speech of the Senator from Indiana in alleged defense of the bill, when we consider his last speech upon the subject, we are driven to the conclusion that he is attempting to divert attention from the pending measure and not to defend it upon its merits. As I have said, in his first speech all that he did was to go back prior to the war and give the record of the Republican Party and of the Nation upon the tariff question. He is still living in the past; and the only reason why he wants to condemn the press of the country is because the press of the country is living in the present hour and the Senator from Indiana, in his political dotage, as well as other Senators, is reminiscent in mind and living wholly in the past.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in these circumstances we had better accept the advice of the New York Herald—that we had better leave matters alone unless we know that we can do something to better the situation. We are not being hurt now by a flood of importations from any quarter; our industries are suffering from depression; but when we find that our exports are decreasing—that nothing is being done to remedy the situation with any promise of success—we had better move cautiously or not move at all.

I want to insert in the RECORD a statement from the Department of Commerce regarding the importance of Europe as a customer of the United States. It gives the percentages of the various kinds of manufactured goods which in pre-war years we were exporting to Europe. It shows the decrease in that market for American products. On page 662 is the beginning of the portion of the article which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD. Its headline is "Dependence of the United States on European markets." I should like to have printed in the RECORD the remainder of the page down to the heading "Distribution of exports in 1913," on the next page, as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from New Mexico will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPENDENCE OF THE UNITED STATES ON EUROPEAN MARKETS.

The dependence of the United States on Europe as a market has been similar to that of the rest of the world. In the year 1913–14, 62.8 per cent of American exports went to Europe, although there had long been a gradual decrease in the relative importance of the European export market for the United States. In 1880 Europe took over 86 per cent of our exports; in 1890, 80 per cent; in 1900, 74.6 per cent; in 1910, 65.1 per cent. In spite of this decrease in relative importance, the absolute values of our exports to Europe were constantly increasing before the war, and Europe has continued to be by far the most important of our export markets.

After the outbreak of the war, the importance of Europe in our export trade increased, both in value and relatively, being 71.2 per cent of our export trade in 1915, 69.2 per cent in 1916, and 68.7 per cent in 1917. This, of course, was a result of large shipments of war supplies to Europe. Following the armistice, however, the proportion of our exports to Europe rapidly declined. In 1921 only 52.7 per cent of our total export trade found its destination in Europe, as compared with 60 to 65 per cent before the war. Although this was still a very large proportion of our exports, Europe was in 1921 far less important relatively than ever before as a market for American goods.

AMERICAN IMPORTS FROM EUROPE.

In the import trade, Europe, preceding the war, supplied the United States approximately 50 per cent of the total. As in the case of exports, there was before the war a gradual but a steady decrease in the proportion of goods bought from Europe. In 1880 we received 55.5 per cent of our imports from Europe; in 1890, 57.1 per cent; in 1900, 51.8 per cent; and in 1914, 47.3 per cent.

During the war, however, imports from Europe dropped to unprecedentedly low volumes, as well as to low percentages of total trade. In 1918 less than 14 per cent of our total imports were from Europe, and even the actual value of imports in that year was less than half the value of the imports in 1914. With the signing of the armistice, imports from Europe rapidly increased, but in 1921 the proportion was still far below pre-war levels, being only 30.5 per cent. Even the absolute value of imports from Europe in 1921, in spite of inflated prices, was much less than the value of imports in 1914.

ARTICLES IN THE AMERICAN TRADE WITH EUROPE.

The following table shows the average value of the groups of commodities imported from and exported to Europe by the United States between 1910 and 1914, as compared with the total American trade during that period:

[June 12, 1922.]

Trade of the United States with Europe and with all countries by groups of commodities (average 1910–1914).

IMPORTS.

Commodities.	From all countries.	From Europe.	Per cent of group total from Europe.	Per cent of all imports from Europe.
Crude materials	$580,000,000	$217,000,000	37.4	26.4
Foodstuffs	397,000,000	101,000,000	25.4	12.2
Manufactures	696,000,000	506,000,000	72.7	61.4

EXPORTS.

Commodities.	To all countries.	To Europe.	Per cent of group total to Europe.	Per cent of all exports to Europe.
Crude materials	$701,000,000	$593,000,000	84.4	44.2
Foodstuffs	421,000,000	300,000,000	71.4	22.3
Manufactures	995,000,000	438,000,000	44.0	33.5

Contrary to the general impression, the preceding table shows that exports of American manufactured goods to Europe constituted a very large proportion of our trade with that continent. The trade of the United States with Europe differs in one important respect from the trade of most other sections of the world with Europe. Most of the non-European countries are chiefly dependent on Europe as a market for foods and raw materials. The United States, being the largest manufacturing country in the world, depended upon Europe not only as a market for foods and raw materials but for manufactured goods as well, and manufactures were the largest element in United States export trade, and the most rapidly growing group of our exports.

During the five years preceding the war exports of American manufactured goods to Europe amounted to $438,000,000, constituting 33⅓ per cent of our total export trade to Europe and 44 per cent of our total exports of manufactures. During the same period foodstuffs exported amounted to $300,000,000, or 22.3 per cent of our exports to Europe and 71.4 per cent of our total exports of foodstuffs. Crude-material exports were valued at $593,000,000, or 44½ per cent of our exports to Europe and 8.4 per cent of crude-material exports.

When it is recalled that manufactured goods make up by far the largest proportion of American exports, and that Europe absorbs 44 per cent of this important group, the dependence of the United States upon Europe as a market not only for our exports in general but for our manufactures becomes evident. Europe is by far our most important market for foodstuffs and crude materials, and also for fabricated materials. It should be noted in this connection that foodstuff imports include both crude foodstuffs and foodstuffs manufactured. If we should include manufactured foodstuffs with other manufactured goods, we would find that approximately 50 per cent of American manufactured products are exported to Europe.

GROUPS OF ARTICLES EXPORTED TO EUROPE.

The importance of Europe as a market for American manufactured products is even more clearly indicated when we consider the chief groups of articles which make up our export of manufactured goods. In the year 1913–14, 60.3 per cent of American exports of agricultural implements were sent to Europe, 17.1 per cent of electrical machinery and appliances, 72.6 per cent of our cash registers, 62.9 per cent of our adding machines, 46 per cent of our sewing machines, 72.7 per cent of our typewriters, 39.9 per cent of our tools, and 32 per cent of all other machinery, including metal-working, textile, mining, and other types of machinery exported from the United States. Iron and steel manufactures other than machinery also depended upon Europe to a very large degree for markets. Of such highly fabricated articles as pipes and fittings Europe took 20.8 per cent of our exports, 9.3 per cent of our structural iron and steel exported, and 28.6 per cent of our exports of miscellaneous iron and steel manufactures.

Even in such highly specialized goods as scientific instruments and apparatus, Europe took 39.8 per cent of our exports; 41.2 per cent of the musical instruments went to Europe; 58.5 per cent of the motorcycles and 36.9 per cent of the automobiles. It is rather surprising that in the group of chemicals, drugs, dyes, and medicines, 26.7 per cent of our large exports were to Europe. Paint exports to Europe constituted 38.8 per cent of our total trade; glass and glassware, 17.5 per cent; rubber goods, 41.8 per cent; leather manufactures, 25 per cent; paper and paper manufactures, 18 per cent; cutlery, 32.4 per cent; and clocks and watches, 36.2 per cent. In fact, a list of our most important exports of manufactured goods shows, with few exceptions, that Europe was the dominating market.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I hope as the discussion of this bill progresses there will be on the part of Senators on the other side of the Chamber a full and complete foundation presented for their statements regarding the bill. We should not legislate with partial facts before us. If the situation is so changed as admitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], as admitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and as frequently admitted by the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. MCCUMBER], I submit that this is not the time to pass such a bill as this. The bill will affect the welfare of every citizen of this land. It is going to make life much harder for many. It will touch every home. Why should not we follow the well known and well recognized rule which the ages have shown should be the governing principle in the enactment of all legislation, that legislators should first ascertain the evil which ought to be remedied and then find the remedy to meet the situation. If the exhibitions made by the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from North Dakota mean anything, if they mean what evidently those Senators expected the country to believe them to mean, then the remedy proposed is puerile; it is senile; it does not properly meet the situation. In such a case, is it not far better not to move at all than to move in this unwise fashion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 84, line 15, to strike out the numeral "25" and to insert "35," so as to read:

PAR. 373. Shovels, spades, scoops, scythes, sickles, grass hooks, corn knives, and drainage tools, and parts thereof, composed wholly or in chief value of iron, steel, lead, copper, brass, nickel, aluminum, or other metal, whether partly or wholly manufactured, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to put into the RECORD some data regarding both enamel ware and aluminum ware. It will require some little time to do it. I wish to make a short statement regarding those industries, which are supposedly beneficiaries under this bill. I wish to show that they are not entitled to levy a tax upon the American people for their benefit. If the Senator from North Dakota desires me to go ahead at any considerable length to-night, I shall do so, but I prefer not to proceed until to-morrow. I may say that my remarks will not be prolonged.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do I understand that the Senator from New Mexico desires to put something into the RECORD now?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to make a statement to the Senate regarding the matter. I desire to have Senators hear it. If the Senator from North Dakota is going to move to take a recess at any time soon, I should prefer that the Senate take a recess now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do I understand that the Senator wishes to present something upon the aluminum paragraph and to discuss the paragraph before we reach it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought we had paragraph 339 under discussion, but I now remember that we passed that over and that the paragraph under discussion now is the one relative to scythes, corn knives, and so forth.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to make just a little bit of progress, and if we can get through with the pending paragraph to-night, I shall then move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have said all I think that I care to say about this paragraph. It is understood, as I stated in the beginning, that we are taking from the free list the farm implements covered by the paragraph and putting them upon the dutiable list, and the question now is as to the rate of duty. The rate provided by the House, I believe, was 20 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its session on this calendar day it shall take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I move, on page 84, line 15, to strike out the numeral "35" and to insert in lieu thereof "20."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to have it noted at this time that on the previous amendment, which was adopted, and on the one just voted upon I will ask for another vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate take a recess, the recess being until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, June 24, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 23, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast given a voice to this day, and help us to understand that Thou art speaking to us by the birth of the morning and by the shades of evening. We thank Thee that the door of our heavenly Father is always open. We ask Thee to write Thy law in hearts of all men. O may the strong stoop to the weak, the wise to the unwise, the rich to the poor, and by precept and example guide them in the ways which shall be for the moral and the material stability of this great people. Destroy, O Lord, the dominion of vengeance and passion, and bring all men together with mutual respect. Make secure for all the high rights of the blessings of peace, industry, and the pursuit of happiness. To the counsels and deliberations of this day give Thy presence. Bestow Thy great favor upon this Assembly, upon every portion of our land, and upon the President of our Republic. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 244 Members answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a matter of procedure and program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, after conference with a good many Members of the House we have come to the conclusion that it would be wise for the House to arrange, if possible through a concurrent resolution, for an adjournment of the House for 30 days, possibly 5 weeks, from about next Friday, if it is possible in the meantime to dispose of the business that must be disposed of before the 1st of July, particularly the appropriation bills. If this program is carried out, it will necessitate the presence of not only a quorum but a very considerable majority of the House from now until the time of the recess. It will be utterly impossible for us to arrange for a recess unless Members remain here in the meantime and unless they are present in the House during the sessions as far as it is possible for them to be. This is not a case where gentlemen can absent themselves and leave it to "George" to do the job. If Members are desirous of having a recess, they must each and all assist in maintaining conditions under which a recess is possible. I therefore express the hope that all of the Members who are now in the city shall remain in the city. We have asked those who are away to return as far as it is at all possible for them to do so, and if we can maintain a goodly majority of the Members here I think it will be entirely possible the latter part of next week, perhaps earlier than Friday, to arrange so that Members can go to their homes for at least a month and possibly somewhat longer. [Applause.]

THIRD DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12090, the third deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 190, noes none.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is a quorum present, but the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and eighteen Members are present, a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12090, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12090, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12090) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday general debate had been finished, and the Clerk will now read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, namely:

LEGISLATIVE.

CAPITOL POWER PLANT.

For repair and replacement of existing equipment and for such additional equipment, alterations, and other facilities as may be necessary to provide the Government Printing Office and the Washington City Post Office with heat, light, and power from the Capitol power plant, including labor and materials, and all other expenses necessary in connection therewith, fiscal year 1923, $271,000.

The Government Printing Office and the Washington City Post Office shall reimburse the Capitol power plant for heat, light, and power supplied during the fiscal year 1923, and the amounts so reimbursed shall be credited to the appropriations for the said plant and be available for the purposes named therein.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "therein" insert: "And the appropriation for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1923 for payment to the Government Printing Office for heat, light, and power shall also be available for such purpose to reimburse the Capitol Power Plant when the connections herein provided for shall have been made."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to make the money available for the power furnished by the central power plant to the city post office. The money for the city post office now is in the general Post Office appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay Mary Steele Brinson, daughter of Samuel M. Brinson, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina, $7,500, to be paid to her legally appointed guardian.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a question has well been called an intellectual plow, ripping up the mental soil and preparing it for seed. So I am going to begin my remarks with a question, one that everyone feels competent to answer off-hand, but which one is sure to answer wrong unless he has looked the matter up. The question is this: How many States participated in the first election of George Washington to the Presidency of the United States? As we always speak of "thirteen original States," the answer that will naturally come to mind is "13." But there were not 13 States participating in that election. There were not 12. There were not 11. There were just 10. The missing members of the "original 13" were New York, North Carolina, and Rhode Island. New York did not ratify the Constitution in time to choose presidential electors; and Washington had been President for months before North Carolina and Rhode Island ratified. In this fact are many important lessons of value to-day. Of these my time will permit calling attention to only a few.

THE NEED OF "A MORE PERFECT UNION."

Ours is a law-abiding people. So when the Continental Congress appointed a committee to draft a declaration of independence, on that same day it appointed another committee to draft a new form of government. This committee reported the Articles of Confederation. It was this instrument that was later superseded by the Constitution.

We became independent in 1776, which independence was formally acknowledged by England in 1781. Washington did not become President until 1789. What were we doing in the intervening years? We were trying experiments, as a young, immature nation might be expected to do.

The experiments resulted disastrously, as in the nature of things similar experiments always will. This period of our history has well been called by John Fiske "the critical period of American history." I commend to all the careful reading of Fiske's book by that title, and I especially commend it to Members of Congress. Such a reading would "frae many an error free us." Why try over again experiments that have already been tried and which have always resulted disastrously?

In our Declaration of Independence were set forth the reasons that "impelled us to the separation" from the mother country. With such experience, no wonder our fathers were fearful of a government superior to our States. So they made the Government of the United States a mere delegate convention to recommend things to the States, but the States retained to themselves the right to follow the recommendations or not, as they saw fit. Were soldiers needed? "The Congress" could decide upon the number required and apportion them among the States respectively, but could not raise a soldier. Was money needed? "The Congress" could determine how much was needed, and apportion it among the several States to be raised by them respectively, but could not raise a dollar. "The Congress" was authorized to "borrow money on the credit of the United States," but it could not raise any funds to meet the obligations when due. It did issue promises to pay, but it could not keep those promises. The result is seen in a phrase still current among us, "not worth a continental," meaning not worth any more than a promise of the Continental Congress, which soon became utterly worthless.

The Articles of Confederation were founded on fear, which all human experience proves is a poor foundation on which to try to build a really worth-while structure. We have seen that the States were afraid of the Nation. The little States were afraid of the big States, as is seen in the provision that, while each State could have from two to seven delegates, "each State shall have one vote" in the Congress.

The people were afraid to trust their own delegates, as is seen in the provision that the term of service was only one year, subject to recall within the year; each State paid its own delegates; and no delegate could serve more than three years in any period of six years. Under this last provision James Madison had to retire from Congress in the midst of valuable service, service that the country greatly needed.

The result? Chaos, devastation, ruin. Foresighted and patriotic men saw the need of "a more perfect union," and a convention was held in Philadelphia in 1787 to amend the Articles of Confederation. This convention soon found that the articles were hopelessly unamendable. After months of patient consideration the immortal convention promulgated for acceptance by the States our time-tried and now universally honored Constitution.

WHY RATIFICATION OF OUR NATIONAL CONSTITUTION WAS DIFFICULT.

The present feeling of everyone toward the American Constitution is one of such reverence that it is hard to believe that there was ever a time when its merits were doubted. Many theories are appealing when first announced, but they will not stand the test of trial. That was the fate of the Articles of Confederation. A century and a third of experience with our National Constitution has only deepened our reverence for it. We are not alone in our respect for its merits. It is honored throughout the world. Gladstone, the famous English statesman, said of it:

The American Constitution is the greatest instrument ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

Why did it not at once command the assent of all able and honorable men?

The Articles of Confederation were based on the theory that if anyone is intrusted with power he will use this power for his own selfish ends. Every element in the articles was based on that idea. That was the fatal element in the articles. The Constitution is based on the exactly opposite theory, that the normal person who is intrusted with power is, by a principle of human nature, stimulated to try to prove worthy of the confidence thus bestowed. How often we have seen a lawyer who has been before the bar the bitterest of partisans, become on the bench the justest of judges? Why? Before the bar he was intrusted with the interests of his client, while on the bench he was intrusted with the interests of the public. In both cases he tried to prove worthy of the trust. Here in this House our Speakers are always before election acknowledged leaders on one side or the other, but on taking the chair they try to be fair to both sides. The articles were based on fear of human frailty; the Constitution is based on faith in human virtue. The first failed, as efforts so founded have always failed and always will. The second succeeded, as institutions so based have almost always succeeded. The lesson is profound but not hard to grasp.

THE STRUGGLE IN VIRGINIA.

The framers of the Constitution were much in doubt as to its reception, so they provided that whenever it was ratified by 9 of the 13 States it should become operative as among the States so ratifying. The required 9 ratified within a few months. But it was deemed wise to await the approval of Virginia, then the leading State of the country, before beginning operations.

The struggle in Virginia was intense. Why? Let us take a brief look at the attitude of some of her leading men. Take Patrick Henry, for instance. Who has not thrilled at his words, recited even yet by school children? Who doubts his ability? Who questions his patriotism? We would naturally expect him to be for the Constitution; but he was against it and fought it with all his wonderful eloquence. Similarly, ratification of the Constitution was opposed by Governor Randolph, by General Lee—"Light Horse Harry," of battle fame—by George Mason, and by others whose names we honor for other things. They were all, no doubt, honest in their opposition, but time has proved that they were absolutely wrong. On the other hand, time has vindicated the judgment of Washington and Hamilton, of Madison and Marshall, and the other men of faith and vision who stood unfalteringly for the Constitution. The great lesson is easily understood: Fear paralyzes human effort; faith brings out all that is best in human nature. Thus was it then; thus will it ever be.

During the War of 1812 some misguided beings, for local and personal reasons, threatened to withdraw from the Union and held the well-remembered Hartford convention with that in view. But the sober, second sense of New England asserted itself and the effort failed. Sixty years ago, for reasons that seemed good at the time, the Union established under the Constitution was again assailed and it took four terrible years of conflict to preserve it. But now even those who tried to disrupt it are glad in their hearts that they failed, and in two wars since then their children and grandchildren have proved that there are none more loyal to the great Republic than they.

BIGNESS MAY BE ESSENTIAL TO GREATEST GOODNESS.

The biggest thing in this country is the United States of America, made up of the union of the smaller units called States; beyond question this biggest thing is the best thing in the secular world. Who believes that the world or our own people would be bettered by the breaking up of the Union into the independent States of which it is composed?

A country is no greater than its people, for it is the people that make the country great or small. Our country is great because we have a great citizenry, who do things on a great scale. To this fact may be attributed our success and the success of our allies in the World War. Who is there among us that will contend for one moment that without the helping hand of our great steel industries our allies would have been vanquished even before we entered that mighty conflict? Like our country, these industries have been built up through a systematic combination of units.

The Bethlehem Steel Corporation ranks in size next to the United States Steel. The Lackawanna Steel Co. is also very large. The two companies have largely different sources of raw material and make largely different products and have different markets. They are complementary to each other rather than competitive with each other. The Bethlehem corporation has bought the Lackawanna. Does the union thus effected promise good or evil to the people of this country? It is important for the country that its legislators have sane opinions on this subject.

A similar merger of the Midvale, the Republic, and the Inland Steel companies is pending. Should we be for it or against it? We can not be true to the confidence shown us by our constituents if we fail to treat these proposed mergers and others like them in the right spirit, having in mind first of all the real and abiding interests of all the people of the Nation.

These proposed mergers are under investigation in New York by the so-called Lockwood committee of the State legislature. In this investigation it has been shown that by reason of its size and equipment the United States Steel Corporation can produce steel at a cost lower by $3 to $5 a ton than any of its competitors. The prosecuting attorney before the Lockwood Commission, the well-known Samuel Untermyer, is reported as saying:

As long as the United States Steel Corporation maintains this dominating situation through its differential of $3 to $5 a ton, so long as these companies are living by the grace of the steel corporation, it does not seem to make much difference whether these smaller concerns merge or do not merge, from the standpoint of competition. After all, such a differential puts the entire steel business of the country right into the hands of the United States Steel Corporation, to do with as it may choose. Heretofore they have pursued an enlightened policy, showing a great deal of vision and a great deal of profit; and the Supreme Court of the United States, much to the surprise of many of our profession, has said that it is not a combination in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. Untermyer, relentless in prosecution, is reported to have asked the head of the great steel corporation, Judge Gary, why it refrained from using its vast power to drive out all competition and make itself a monopoly. To this inquiry Judge Gary is reported to have answered:

For two good reasons: First, it would not be right; second, we dare not do it.

Judge Gary has often said:

Obey the law. Even if you think the law not entirely wise, obey it while it is the law, reserving the right to use all proper means to amend it or end it.

This injunction covers human law; but it was knowledge of law that is more than human that prompted the Judge to say, "We dare not do it." He had in mind the higher law of the only All Wise Lawmaker, under which continued prosperity depends on a square deal for all—competitors, customers, employees, the public generally. He knows that that is the only enduring basis.

At a banquet in New York City some 10 years ago one of the speakers, a man not connected with the steel corporation, said laughingly:

The Attorney General of the United States seems to have lost his sense of humor, for in a recent formal document he actually charges the United States Steel Corporation with having invested over $500,000,000 in improving its plants—in order to restrain trade.

Thus from an unfriendly attorney, on the one hand, and from an apparently friendly speaker on the other, both confirmed by the sober judgment of the United States Supreme Court, we have approval of the great corporation. Recurring, first, to the great Republic, we know that bigness is not only not badness but that bigness is essential to the greatest goodness. Does anyone outside of a madhouse believe that resolving this mighty Nation into its constituent States would be a good thing for any human being on earth? By parity of reasoning, would the division of the United States Steel Corporation into its constituent companies be of enduring benefit to any one of our people?

What is the secret of the ability of the corporation to produce steel at lower cost than any of its competitors? Let us hear from the head of the foremost of those competitors, Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. Mr. Schwab was the first president of the United States Steel Corporation and served as such for many years before building up the Bethlehem company, so he is an exceptionally competent witness. Some two years ago, in Collier's, Mr. Schwab said:

Before the organization of the United States Steel Corporation individual concerns owned individual mines. No company was sufficiently large to own groups of mines of different characteristics and qualities.

The best steel results are obtained by scientific mixtures of different sorts of ores. By consolidating the ore interests of all the steel companies, we were able to give each individual company the ideal mixtures for producing the best results most economically. That was an enormous advantage.

The transportation of materials offered equal opportunities to economize. Ships did not have to wait—

Mr. Schwab means the ships bringing ore down the Lakes—until a particular cargo could be loaded for a particular works, but they could be kept steadily moving, and be assigned in transit to this or that works.

Mills that formerly had to make a great variety of articles were, by reason of the consolidation, enabled to run steadily in one line, thus producing a greater tonnage at very much lower cost. The arrangement made possible equally great economies in distribution. Selling forces were consolidated, and every one of the inevitable wastes of small business was lopped off.

Thus, in brief, we see why the big corporation can produce steel so much cheaper than can its smaller competitors. The new merger, engineered by Schwab and others, knowing wherein the superiority of the United States Steel Corporation's methods of production are inevitably to be found—in size and quality of equipment—are making an effort to get for the component companies of the new combination similar advantages in production and distribution.

Is it for or against the public interest that they are acting? Is it our duty to help or to hinder? They are trying to get into position to produce even more efficiently than now. They are trying to eliminate needless wastes, avoidable by means proposed and not otherwise. Does real human progress lie in helping them in their efforts or in trying to thwart them? The first thought of the people of the Nation may be that their plans should be prevented from being carried through. But there is no doubt that the sober second thought of the people will not be that. It seems to me that we should emulate George Washington rather than Patrick Henry in the trying days long past, and do our plain duty, fully believing that time will vindicate what is right.

As legislators of the Nation we are in duty and honor bound not to trifle with the confidence reposed in us. Our people have, by giving us these positions of honor and trust, practically said to us: "We are kept too busy with earning our daily bread to have time to look into national problems with the care they require to solve wisely. We have placed you on the lookout. We have provided you with ample, though not large, incomes to enable you to give undivided attention to the right solution of these problems. There are others who could do this as well as you can perhaps, but we have intrusted the doing of it to you. Study these problems, not with the idea of telling us what we might be pleased to hear but with the sober intention of telling us what we ought to know. Do not try to play on our prejudices for temporary advantage to yourself, but believe in us and appeal to our sober judgment. We'll overlook an honest mistake, knowing that to err is human. But we will not forgive or forget any trifling with our real interests. We haven't time to make the necessary investigation ourselves. We believe that you have more talent than the average citizen can reasonably be expected to have, and we expect you to tell us the truth, believing that we will approve it when we hear it."

UNITED STATES STEEL—A CORPORATION WITH A SOUL.

It will be interesting and instructive for us to study with some care the operations of the biggest business organization in the world as the best example of efficient operation. We have seen something of the reason why it can produce at lower cost than any of its competitors, of which it has scores. Let us see, briefly, what it does with its profits. Investigation will show that it devotes them fundamentally to four things:

1. To good wages to its employees, with the steadiest practicable employment, under the safest and most sanitary and satisfactory conditions practicable under all the circumstances.

2. To extension and improvement of its plants. On these are expended $50,000,000 to $150,000,000 a year.

3. To reasonable dividends to its owners. These are never exorbitant, running 7 per cent per annum to holders of preferred stock and 5 per cent per annum to holders of common stock.

4. To building up a reserve, laying aside in good times a surplus to enable it to pass through hard times with a minimum of anxiety to its owners and its employees. This reserve is also insurance of due service at all times and at reasonable prices to the public.

Meantime it treats its competitors with every reasonable consideration and acts as a stabilizer to the market. It never encourages a "runaway" market or "profiteers" on its customers. On the other hand, in bad times it does not try to undersell its competitors, though, as we have seen, it could do so by reason of its lower costs.

Who is responsible for building up this giant industry and putting into it this fine spirit? The man more responsible than anyone else is Elbert H. Gary. Let us look at him first through the eyes of an exceptionally clever writer, Horace Wade, author of "In the Shadow of Great Peril," who recently interviewed Judge Gary in his office, from a report of which interview I take this typical extract:

A man of steel—strong, big, and fine—a boy who worked on a farm and got to be head of America's greatest corporation. That's the way Judge Elbert H. Gary looks. And pleasant! I think that the wonderful thing about Judge Gary is his kindness. There is something as gentle as a woman in his manner.

Mr. Chairman, I have recently read a remarkable book entitled "United States Steel: A Corporation with a Soul." Although perhaps the most important plant of the corporation is in my district, and I am somewhat familiar with its operation, I had never had time or opportunity to get into the real philosophy underlying this great organization. This book tells the story of the coming true of the dream of a big man in the general interest. It is the story of Elbert H. Gary and the United States Steel Corporation, written by Arundel Cotter, of New York City, who writes as one having accurate information. I have conferred with former Congressman James T. McCleary, to whom I am indebted for many of the facts stated in these remarks, who was for about 10 years secretary of the American Iron & Steel Institute, and who may therefore be expected to have thorough information on the subject. Mr. McCleary tells me that he has read the book three times carefully and has found only one mistake. It is an unimportant one, being simply the date of the last of the Gary dinners. Mr. Cotter's book is so valuable, as setting forth really important information that should be known to every intelligent person, but especially to men like us who are trusted with the management of national affairs, that I feel it my duty to the country, as well as a real pleasure, to quote briefly from the book, so that my associates may have it brought to their attention and be able to judge somewhat of its merits through such samples. Mr. Cotter begins his book in this way:

Mere size, to the majority of us, presents a certain fascination. Especially is this the case when it is the result of human endeavor. Hence were the United States Steel nothing but the largest business aggregation in the world, its immensity alone might justify placing on record the facts connected with its formation and its subsequent history. The corporation's vast capitalization, a billion and a half of dollars, its yearly turnover exceeding its capital, its pay roll of 275,000 workers, or, with their families, enough to populate a large city, its productive capacity of more than 16,000,000 tons of steel annually—

Exceeding the entire production of any other country than this—to say nothing of other products, the volume of its fleet of ore boats, several times the tonnage passing through the Suez Canal, its foreign trade of $200,000,000—these alone might make the corporation's history worth the telling.

But size, properly considered, is of minor importance in itself. Its importance lies in the power it bestows to influence its surroundings. The greatest of all industrial enterprises could not fail to affect industrial history generally. And the management of the corporation has recognized its responsibility in this regard and has endeavored to use its strength not selfishly but for the good of all concerned. It is not too much to say that the organization of the United States Steel Corporation marked the beginning of a new and better era in industrial history.

In the book thus begun we have an exceedingly interesting account of the great corporation—its conception, its birth, its early struggles, the men who have made it, the policies that have governed it, the success in every way that has marked its progress—all these things are told in a way to hold one's rapt attention and to leave him or her the wiser and the better for the close contemplation of such a really worth-while achievement.

Early in the book is given this clear insight into the situation in the steel industry before the organization of the corporation:

In the fierce and bitter struggle that faced the early steel trade, only the most daring or the most unscrupulous manufacturer could survive; and under the strain for production that was necessitated, only the strongest workers could live. Under the most favorable conditions, the steel mill, as a well-known steel maker said once, is far from being a drawing room. Under the conditions that prevailed toward the close of the last century, when men were worked to the breaking point in the mad fight for tonnage, it is no wonder that the majority of steel workers collapsed early under the strain and were thrown on the human scrap pile, their vitality sapped and their youth gone.

The one slogan of the industry was "tonnage." Everything was sacrificed by the manufacturer to this single end. Machinery, comparatively new, was scrapped to make room for more modern equipment. Waste of this kind was not considered. Production was everything, and nothing was spared to obtain increased output. And it must be admitted that to this attitude on the part of the producers, as much, perhaps, as to her immense natural advantages, the United States owed her rapid rise to the front rank of steel nations.

Gary's ambition, like Carnegie's, knew no bounds; but where the little Scotch ironmaster worked to make the steel industry an empire over which he should reign supreme, Gary dreamed of an immense republic of steel. Where Carnegie sought to unify the control of the steel trade and bring it into his own hands, Gary sought to make the industry one owned by the people, particularly by the workers. Where Carnegie stopped at the ocean and gave his attention to world business only at times when overproduction at home compelled him to seek foreign markets temporarily, Gary sought to establish a world-wide and permanent market for the product of the blast furnaces and rolling mills of the United States. And the history of the United States Steel Corporation is the story of how Gary made his dream come true.

THE CORPORATION NOT TRYING TO BE A MONOPOLY.

Beginning on page 37, Cotter gives a statement of the industry outside of the corporation, showing that it has never used its great power to hurt its competitors but, on the other hand, has been to all most generous in its treatment. Mr. Cotter well says:

Since the corporation began its existence a number of new steel companies have sprung into being, grown and expanded, while the older so-called independents have greatly increased their output. Although the corporation has added to its steel-making capacity, its competitors have added a still larger amount, with the result that the big company now controls less than one-half of the steel production of the United States.

Enjoying the confidence of a number of steel manufacturers competing with the steel corporation, the writer has been unable after patient investigation to find any evidence of its having at any time used its immense wealth to undersell a competitor, large or small, with the purpose of driving it out of business; while he has discovered more than one instance where it has actually assisted competitors. A company, especially one whose very size exposes it to envy and attack, could not fail to earn the enmity of its competitors if its methods were not at all times fair and above suspicion. The Steel Trust's competitors have time and again, privately and publicly, and under oath, declared that they have no cause of complaint against it.

But how about its customers? This question Cotter answers thus:

How has the customer, the steel consumer, fared? The corporation has always been slow to advance prices and equally slow to lower them. It has usually endeavored to prevent prices from reaching an abnormally high level in "boom" times, when overwhelming demand had placed the steel seller in control of the market by setting a maximum quotation at a fair level, permitting any manufacturer a fair profit, and has thus protected the consumer whose urgent need of the metal at a particular time made him a prey to profiteering. * * * And whether for quick or deferred delivery, it charges one price.

Now, let us see how the steel worker has fared. In Mr. Cotter's book this subject is deservedly given large space, because it is particularly in its treatment of the workers in mine and mill that the Gary plan is noteworthy. Though strongly tempted to quote at length on this subject, I am hoping that a small sample will prompt in the reader the desire to read the entire book, as I have done twice with great satisfaction, the facts revealed being highly creditable to human nature and therefore good reading for anyone who wishes well the man who is in the hardest part of the struggle for a career of high or low degree. Here is where the corporation shows its fine "soul." Beginning on page 40, Cotter says:

Nor has the steel worker been lost sight of. It is admitted by all familiar with the subject that the Steel Corporation has been responsible for the steady and decided advance in wages in the industry that has been witnessed in the last 19 years. Wages have been increased voluntarily and without demand from the men whenever trade conditions made increases possible. At the same time the corporation has set its face against reducing wages in times of stress. And, what is more important, it has spent immense sums of money on sanitation, education, and other ways of bettering the wage earner's lot, has helped him to save and invest his money by offering special inducements for so doing, and has set an example to industry generally that has done more for the cause of common labor than has been accomplished by labor unions themselves. * * * Among the stockholders of the big enterprise more than one-third are men who work in the furnaces, mines, mills, and offices, and these have become stockholders under the plan that permits employees to acquire stock on the installment plan and offers a premium as an inducement to hold it.

THE STOCK SUBSCRIPTION PLAN.

It may be of interest to know more about this stock subscription plan. Cotter speaks of it thus:

The plan as finally worked out and put into operation was designed to accomplish three main objects: First, to interest the employees in the Steel Corporation as a whole, and not merely in the operations of the subsidiary for which they worked; second, to give them an incentive to do everything possible to reduce expenses and correspondingly increase profits; third, to offer them an inducement to stay with the corporation and identify themselves with it. * * * In effect, the stock subscription plan makes for a capital-labor partnership. It benefits both the worker and the employing company. In a small way it makes the worker a capitalist himself and enables him to see something of both sides in capital and labor disputes.

From information in Cotter's book I have framed the following table showing the recent operations under the stock-subscription plan, giving the number of employees subscribing for stock during the last six years, year by year, and the number of shares taken by them each year:

Year.	Shares taken.	Employees subscribing.	Year.	Shares taken.	Employees subscribing.
1916	49,538	24,631	1919	155,098	59,792
1917	60,519	38,326	1920	161,298	63,792
1918	93,488	41,991	1921	255,308	81,710

From this table we can readily see that the plan is growing year by year in the confidence of the workingmen; they are subscribing in ever-increasing numbers and for ever-increasing numbers of shares. This indicates clearly a very desirable increase in thrift. Every man will be, in consequence, a better neighbor and a better citizen.

SOME OF THE OTHER THINGS DONE FOR EMPLOYEES.

At the meeting of the American Iron and Steel Institute in May, 1920, in compliance with the desire of the members for information, Charles L. Close, manager of the corporation's bureau of safety, sanitation, and welfare, gave a list of welfare facilities installed by the corporation up to January 1, 1920. Some of the principal items are: Dwelling houses and boarding houses constructed and leased to employees at low rentals, 27,553; churches, 25; schools, 45; clubs, 19; restaurants and lunch rooms, 64; rest and waiting rooms, 210; playgrounds, 131; swimming pools, 11; athletic fields, 96; tennis courts, 107; sanitary drinking fountains, 3,077; pipe systems for drinking water, 369; protected wells and springs, 647; comfort stations (complete units, either bath or dry houses, closets, wash and locker rooms), showers, 2,672; clothes lockers, 116,749; base hospitals, 25; emergency stations, 286; company surgeons, physicians, and internes, 167; outside surgeons on salary, 107; nurses, 189; visiting nurses, 68; teachers and instructors, 222; safety inspectors, spending entire time on safety work, 101; employees who have served on safety committees, 25,948; employees now serving on safety committees, 5,500; employees who have been trained in first-aid or rescue work, 16,801; employees now in training, 801.

From 1912 to the end of 1919 expenditures in these lines were: Welfare, $11,751,429; sanitation, $11,732,666; accident prevention, $6,530,706; relief for injured men and families of men killed, $22,652,238; cost of employees' stock subscription plan, $9,160,000; pension fund payments in excess of income provided by permanent fund, $1,824,693; for creation of permanent fund, $8,000,000; total, $71,651,732. A sum of $5,113,570 paid in pensions to employees from a fund originally established by Andrew Carnegie is not included in the above total.

Concerning the success of the stock-subscription plan, Cotter says:

In its application the stock-subscription plan has been an unqualified success. Particularly in recent years employees of all classes, from common labor to executives, have shown eagerness to avail themselves of its terms to acquire a personal financial interest in the big corporation. Subscriptions have for years far exceeded the amounts of stock offered, but all subscriptions have been honored.

Naturally the stock-subscription plan has not been regarded with favor by those whose interests lie in fomenting dissent between capital and labor, and the plan has been attacked in many ways. One of these is the charge that it is a money-making scheme, under which the corporation purchases its own stock cheap and sells to the workers at a profit. As a matter of fact, the operation of the plan is a continuous source of expense to the corporation, which has so far spent on it an aggregate of $9,160,000. It has, however, profited from the plan in one way—increased loyalty, efficiency, and cooperation.

THE MAN AT THE HELM.

In the prologue to his book Mr. Cotter pays this well-deserved tribute to the man in whose heart and brain was born this magnificent enterprise, an achievement of which any man might well feel proud:

Every business enterprise however great, reflects in its dealings with its competitors, its customers, its employees, and the public generally the individuality of some one man. Curious as it may seem at first glance, this personal touch, far from being lost, is particularly evident in the greatest of all business enterprises—the United States Steel Corporation. Many men, including some of the ablest financiers the country has produced, have assisted in a measure in making the corporation what it is to-day. Morgan, Frick, Perkins, and others have helped with their counsel in bringing the corporation to the preeminent place it holds to-day in the industrial world. But one man has stood out among all these—Elbert H. Gary, its chairman and executive officer. Throughout its ramifications the Steel Corporation is everywhere a reflection of Gary's spirit. His influence from the time of its incorporation nearly 20 years ago—

Mr. Cotter's book was published in 1921—

has shaped its policies and, almost from the beginning, has dominated its counsels. For what the corporation is, whether good or bad, Gary must accept full responsibility. Judge Gary himself would probably object to the word "dominated." He would doubtless prefer "guided," for his dominance has never been autocratic. But his colleagues, except perhaps in the earlier days, have confidently accepted his opinion on all matters pertaining to the corporation's welfare. And the events of the last few years have proven that they were right in so doing.

Gary's attitude toward labor was well known. He believed in "leaning over backward" in the matter of giving justice to the worker. And when union organizers and radical agitators attempted to force the closed shop on the industry many of his competitors feared that he would yield to the demand of the labor organizers. But Gary never flinched from responsibility, however great. Here a question of principle was involved concerning not the rights of the employer alone but those of the very large number of unorganized workers. Although pressure was brought to bear upon him from high quarters to compromise and avoid a strike, and later to settle it once begun, the head of the corporation unswervingly stood his ground and led the steel trade to a signal victory. * * *

On October 24, 1919, the annual meeting of the American Iron and Steel Institute was held in New York City at the Hotel Commodore. Some sixteen hundred of its members, including the majority of the leading figures in the steel trade, attended. The steel strike had been going on for some weeks and the steel men were gathered to hear what Gary had to say. The entrance of the judge into this gathering was the signal for a most remarkable demonstration, for these staid, solid business men, on catching sight of Gary, broke into a spontaneous salvo of cheers, which was enthusiastic and prolonged. It was a tribute to his generalship in the struggle then being waged, an unequivocal admission of his right to supreme command. In that storm of cheers were buried all doubt that may have ever been entertained.

It is impossible to write of the Steel Corporation without writing of its head. His influence on it is too direct, too personal, to be ignored. The corporation, in a sense, is Gary. He has infused it with his spirit, a spirit which, it is hoped, will continue always to dominate it.

I can not better close these quotations from this most interesting and instructive and inspiring book than in Cotter's own words:

Perhaps no better conclusion for this volume can be found than the remark recently made to the writer by one of the leading independent steel makers. He said, "United States Steel is a remarkable organization. Nothing like it exists or ever existed. It is in a class by itself."

MARSHAL FOCH'S TRIBUTE TO AMERICAN STEEL MEN.

The American Iron and Steel Institute, of which Judge Gary was the originator, and from its organization till the present has been its president, holds two general meetings a year, one in May and the other usually in October. These meetings always close with a banquet. In 1921 the fall meeting was postponed until the 18th of November to permit the attendance of Marshal Foch, the great generalissimo of the allied armies in the World War, who was the guest of honor on that occasion. Not being fluent in the use of English, Marshal Foch spoke in his native French.

In his speech the marshal voiced the well-deserved admiration of the world and himself for that great organization, the American Iron and Steel Institute, and the men and the industry for which it stands. It was to this splendid organization that in the hour of need the National Government turned for service that no other body could render. The Government of the United States turned over to this organization the responsibility of providing for the steel needs of the allied armies, and in the carrying out of the heavy duty thus imposed, the great trust thus bestowed, the American Iron and Steel Institute never once fell down, as was so strikingly set forth in the marshal's speech. Translated into English, the marshal's address was as follows:

Three years ago to-day, on November 18, 1918, the allied armies, with shouldered arms, began a march of 200 kilometers, which carried them victoriously to the Rhine. The Germans had requested several days, from November 11 to November 18, of respite to put somewhat of order into their ranks, which had been thrown into disorder during their rapid retreat toward Germany. This result was the consecration of the great effort which led us to victory.

But for the coordination of a battle, the achievement of a victory, one must seek the cause. I find it about me this evening. Victory has been attributed to unity of command. But to attain it, to sustain it, there is necessary unity of sentiment, of ideals, of action, behind the armies; and of first importance were the formidable efforts of our industries which gave us the necessary material.

Battles of the present day are, indeed, won by men, but not solely by force of numbers. They are won, above all, by supply of munitions, of machines. Many cannon are necessary. For the cannon there is need of many shells. This again makes necessary, in the rear of the armies, means of transport so formidable as to defy imagination. Before the war the most advanced nations estimated the daily consumption at 14,000, 20,000, or 30,000 shots per day. In 1918 the allied armies had arrived at 500,000 to 600,000 shots per day. This necessitated a like increase in technical elements, as well as extraordinary means of transportation behind the lines.

Now this formidable consumption which we thus attained would not have been possible without the industrial production which furnished the Army with materials, with machines. It was this extraordinary production which you were capable of attaining that permitted us to carry through the succession of victories that led to the armistice. Permit me, then, to see the principal elements of our victory in the admirable industrial efforts which you put forth at that very moment, making it possible to sustain the advance of our armies, always sure of the necessary support behind the lines. As you never failed to keep your promise, as we never lacked the projectiles which we needed, it was your activity, your energy, your will which procured us victory.

Further, allow me to see behind this production a supreme patriotism which existed everywhere and of which the sole objective was to win the war. Permit me, then, to-day to salute with profound respect this industrial capacity which permitted us to advance without lack of necessary material and thus avoid great losses. It is with this thought, gentlemen, that I greet you now with feelings of profound gratitude.

CHARLES M. SCHWAB'S RESPONSE TO MARSHAL FOCH.

Following this fine and well-deserved tribute to the American steel industry, which, coming from such a high source, was indeed commendation to be proud of, expressed with soldierly brevity and pointedness and with French courtesy, President Gary introduced Mr. Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation (which is next in size to the United States Steel Corporation), and former Director General of the United States Shipping Board during the war, one of the three vice presidents of the institute, to respond to Marshal Foch. Mr. Schwab, a great favorite with all the members of the institute, said in part:

I highly appreciate the honor which the directors and the chairman gave me in asking me to say a few words this evening. * * *

I like to feel, and in the presence of this gathering the feeling is most intense, that there is something peculiarly fine and honorable and strong in our profession of workers in iron and steel. The painters of word pictures have never been able to describe a great and strong character better than as "a man of iron." The soldiers, bravely facing enemy shot and bayonet, were described as men of iron nerves and will of steel. In our own day, when we seek a symbol for what is enduring, for what is steadfast in character, we find nothing better than steel.

And so, my dear Marshal, may I tell you, in the language of the greatest of poets, that you have been "grappled to our souls with hooks of steel." * * *

Great as he was in all the responsibilities of war leadership, Marshal Foch will stand as the supreme representative in all history of unity of action and command. Have you, my friends, ever thought how frequently this profound principle of action applies in life and industry? Individuals and individual interests can accomplish but little; united effort and cooperation under single leadership can accomplish anything. So it is in industry, our industry, all industry; unity of action, unity of command, is the most effective means to great results.

When a battle is to be fought, when a game is to be won, when a struggle of any kind is to be undertaken, we need first of all the great commander, the man with vision to see what should be done, the man with courage to undertake it, the man with power of leadership to induce other people to follow him. We of the great steel industry have much to learn from this great principle. The greatness of industrial achievement has been realized through the application of it, and America will continue to rise to still greater heights of achievement as she allows the principle to have freedom of action.

We in this country are in the midst of a great business depression, a depression that is affecting the steel industry quite as acutely as any other industry in the country. To escape from this slough of despond, the various factors of the steel business must consider the interests of the whole country rather than merely seek to promote their selfish aims.

In Judge Gary, the president of our Iron and Steel Institute, we have a really great leader. Let us follow him in his optimism and his determination to surmount the many difficulties to be met. By availing ourselves of his farsighted wisdom, of his years of experience and knowledge, and by being guided by his direction in this great business depression that faces us we will see this depression fade away and find such prosperity as has never been known in this country before.

I would be glad to include all of Mr. Schwab's admirable address given in full in the Yearbook of the American Iron and Steel Institute. I have necessarily had to omit all but one reference to Marshal Foch, to whom the address was principally given over. But I have chosen the part of the address that particularly refers to Judge Gary and the United States Steel Corporation. It is well for us to remember that these words of Mr. Schwab are particularly pregnant with meaning, coming as they do from the head of the chief rival of the United States Steel Corporation. Coming thus from a strong competitor the commendation by Mr. Schwab of his business rival, Judge Gary, is "praise indeed." This attitude of Mr. Schwab harmonizes exactly with that of everyone I have ever met who knew Judge Gary well. Mr. Schwab spoke for the whole great steel industry. And those who are only incidentally connected with the steel industry, who know the judge in other relations, are equally eloquent concerning him, all testifying to his uniform fairness and kindness and wisdom.

ETHICS IN BUSINESS.

Last Saturday—June 17, 1922—at Evanston, Ill., Judge Gary delivered an address that is so characteristic of him and his views on business relations, that in closing I quote, as best I can from the Associated Press report, necessarily brief, a few sentences from this inspiring address. Judge Gary is reported as having said:

Business throughout the United States is to-day transacted on a higher plane than ever before. * * * The world is surely growing better. * * * The large majority of business men now conduct their affairs in accordance with the avowed belief that right is superior to might, that morality is at least on a par with legality, and that the observance of both is essential to worthy achievement.

Judge Gary is quoted as saying further:

Business men also recognize that the rights of customers must always be respected; that employees are associates rather than servants, and should be treated accordingly; that stockholders of corporations, as well as partners, are entitled to any information immediately on receipt of the same by an officer or partner; that destructive competition must give way to humane competition; and that full and prompt publicity of all facts involving the public weal is demanded. * * * Ethical management brings profits to business. Any man or concern that firmly establishes a reputation for honesty and fair dealing has a business asset of great pecuniary value.

Concerning workingmen the judge said what he has always practiced:

Conscientious treatment of employees will tend to increase their loyalty and efficiency. * * * In every particular a contented workman is far superior to one who is dissatisfied and disgruntled.

To men in public life there is suggestion well worthy of the careful consideration of all of us. It is reported in the newspapers thus:

As a passing suggestion it may be observed that henceforth the political party which pays the most attention to ethics is likely to secure indorsement by the majority of voters, especially the women.

In accounting for the great change in the attitude of captains of industry the judge very properly gives large credit to the late Theodore Roosevelt, who did so much to place right ahead of might in popular opinion and so mightily stirred up the public conscience. Without immodesty the judge might well have admitted that he was himself a pioneer in preaching and practicing righteousness in business.

SOMETHING OF WHAT IT MEANS.

It is easier for all of us to understand a principle of life when we see it exemplified in human form. "Actions speak louder than words." This has been my thought in presenting on this floor some of the results of my investigations. The greatest plant of the United States Steel Corporation is at Gary, in my district. That enterprise I am somewhat familiar with. The things that I have quoted about it I believe to be true. They reveal beyond question that United States Steel is indeed a "corporation with a soul."

One of the lessons that I gather from this study, to which I have been giving thought for quite a while, is that it is the very bigness of the corporation that enables it to set the pace in good things, in its treatment of its competitors, of its customers, and of its employees, from all groups of which sworn testimony was given in its favor in the suit for the dissolution of its fairness and its kindness. While it is the duty of its managers to remember the reasonable rights of its stockholders, its everyday actions show that fairness to all parties, including the public, is not only consistent with good business principles but that, indeed, it lies at the root of the highest business success, such as has been achieved by this really wonderful business organization.

With this shining example before the eyes of all men, there is no excuse for keeping unenlightened in our dealings in every relation in life. It is coming to be more generally understood that, after all, the best basis on which to build hopes for business success is that given nineteen hundred years ago, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment to Robert L. Doughton for expenses incurred as contestee in the contested-election case of Campbell v. Doughton, audited and recommended by the Committee on Elections No. 2, $2,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 19, insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"For payment to Thomas W. Harrison for expenses incurred as contestee in the contested-election case of Paul v. Harrison, audited and recommended by Committee on Elections No. 1, $2,000.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reimbursement to the official stenographers to committees for the amounts actually expended and necessarily expended by them during the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress up to and including June 30, 1922, $875 each, $3,500.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 3, line 24, after the sum "$3,500," insert "of which $875 shall be paid to the widow of M. R. Blumenberg, late an official stenographer to committees."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a good many Members of the House, and especially the older Members, those who have served on the Committee on Appropriations, knew Mr. Blumenberg, who was the dean of the committee stenographers of the House, very well. He has just died, and I am sure that I express the sympathy of all the Members of the House with his widow, and also express the sentiment of the House by saying that Mr. Blumenberg was one of the most capable men ever connected with the employment of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance, repair, and for exchange of an automobile for the Speaker of the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1922, $2,500.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 4, after line 3, insert: "For additional compensation during the fiscal year 1923 to the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, $1,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in this connection that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations gets $4,000 a year, and $1,000 additional while the present man occupies the place. A good many people have been trying to get him away from the service he now renders to the Congress. I have never known a man in all the history of my experience so well qualified, with so comprehensive a knowledge of Government matters, as Mr. Sheild, and while I offer an amendment to increase his compensation for 1923 by $1,000, I wish to say that that will not begin to compensate him for his value. He really is worth anything the Government might be called upon to pay him, and it would be a serious loss to the Government if by any chance he should separate himself from it. Every member of the Committee on Appropriations loves and trusts the man as they love and trust nobody else. He is worthy of the love and the confidence of the country, and particularly of those who come in daily contact with him. If I were to say all that I would like to say about him he would probably blush. So I will not attempt to say anything further as to his qualifications or his worth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sixty per cent of the foregoing sums for the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, before the District of Columbia appropriations are disposed of in this bill, to go back a little beyond the last paragraph just read, I would like to inquire with reference to the appropriation for temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors in the building inspection division.

Mr. MADDEN. That is already provided for.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to ask whether you hope the District Committee will bring in permanent legislation so that this item will not have to be carried as a temporary appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. All the legislation that is enacted for the District in appropriations for any purpose is in order under the act to increase the activities from time to time. The appropriation for temporary inspectors depends on how much building there is. These men will be laid off when the work is through.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not intended to——

Mr. MADDEN. It is to give them an additional number during the rush season.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

For settlement of claims arising under article 4 of an act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war," approved March 8, 1918, $25,000, to continue available during the fisca' year 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: On page 8, after line 23, insert as a separate paragraph:
"Allotments of appropriations for medical and hospital services may be made during the fiscal year 1923 by the United States Veterans' Bureau to the United States Public Health Service for the care of beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and incidental expenses, and such allotments shall also be available for expenditure by the United States Public Health Service for the necessary personnel, regular and reserve commissioned officers of the United States Public Health Service, clerical help in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including all personnel, regular and reserve commissioned officers, and others heretofore or hereafter detailed for duty to the United States Veterans' Bureau."

Mr. MADDEN. The only difference between the language in this amendment and the language in the 1923 appropriation act is found in the second line from the last of my amendment—"or hereafter detailed." And that is made necessary by a ruling of the Comptroller General, which says that they can not make the payment where the assignments are made unless the language is so modified. These assignments from the Public Health Service of the Veterans' Bureau were made as the result of an Executive order of the President of the United States. If this is not adopted, the activities existing between the Public Health Service and the Veterans' Bureau and payment for those activities will cease on the 1st of July.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous expenses: For an additional amount for printing, stationery, and envelopes, and for purchase, repair, and exchange of adding machines, addressing machines, typewriters, check-signing machines, and other labor-saving devices, furniture, filing cabinets, and postage on foreign mail, to enable the Bureau of Pensions to carry out the provisions of the act of May 3, 1922, for the monthly payment of pensions, fiscal year 1923, $45,875.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, between lines 13 and 14, add a new paragraph on page 11, between lines 13 and 14, to read as follows:

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS—CALIFORNIA.

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, California, including pay of superintendent, $24,000; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; for reconstruction of school building destroyed by fire on December 17, 1921, to be immediately available, $60,000; in all, $88,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is not germane to the bill, and this has already been appropriated for, I wish to say to the gentleman from California, for the next fiscal year, in the Interior Department bill. So there is no necessity for it.

Mr. RAKER. This school burned down on December 17, 1921. There are 100 pupils there without any facilities for going to school. There are 28 buildings. This is a plant already established. The Government has about $250,000 expended on it. These Indian pupils have no place in which to go to school. Now, if this bill is allowed and goes through by the 1st of July this school can be built and be in operation by the 1st of October, and the school can be opened in proper shape.

I trust that the gentleman will let the amendment go through, so that we can establish this school and give these Indians an opportunity to get an education. It shall be my purpose to continue this effort until the poor Indian children are provided for and the school building rebuilt and the school at the Greenville Indian school property fully equipped and running. Give the Indian boy and girl a chance for a little education. It will help them, and by thus helping them we help the country generally. I feel that the chairman of this great committee [Mr. MADDEN] will eventually see that this appropriation is made. I will surely keep at and after him until his committee does make this provision in one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this matter was all threshed out in the House when the Interior Department appropriation bill was before the House, and it was threshed out in conference adversely to the position of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. Appropriations were made for other schools for the accommodation of these same pupils, and what the gentleman proposes would be a duplication of accommodations for the next year. I should be obliged to make the point of order if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations did not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order on what ground?

Mr. MADDEN. On the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. CRAMTON. And on the further ground, Mr. Chairman, that it provides for the erection of new buildings not now authorized by law.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand under the rule that as to new buildings, per se, the erection and establishment of them, the point of order would be good; but I want to direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that here is an established, going concern. There are some 28 buildings at this plant, some smaller and some larger. There is a farm connected with it and all other equipments. The assembly hall or school building was destroyed by fire.

Now, this is to reconstruct that school building and continue the plant, and therefore it does not fall within the rule that it is a new building. To my mind it is clearly in order under the rule that I call to the attention of the Chair. I think the mere statement of it is sufficient, and I shall not go into further detail in regard to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Michigan on the matter.

Mr. CRAMTON. The point of order is made on the item of $60,000, which is to put up a building in the place of one destroyed by fire. The Committee on Appropriations has not the jurisdiction to authorize such a building. That authorization must come from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is not germane, besides.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment reads:

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS—CALIFORNIA.

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville School, California, including pay of superintendent, $24,000; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; for reconstruction of school building destroyed by fire on December 18, 1921, to be immediately available, $60,000; in all, $88,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Manifestly the one item contained in the amendment, namely, for reconstruction of school building destroyed by fire on December 17, 1921, authorizes an appropriation for a building which has not been authorized to be constructed by law, and therefore it seems to me the amendment is subject to a point of order as to that item.

Chairman TILSON, on February 4, 1920—page 2635 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session, Sixty-sixth Congress—in ruling on a similar matter, said:

While a committee may report a bill embracing different subjects it is not in order during consideration in the House to introduce a new subject by way of amendment.

To a bill making appropriations for deficiencies in the Government service, an amendment appropriating for a service not mentioned in the bill is not germane.

There are other precedents to the same effect.

I think these rulings are supported by reason, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of criticism, but a question of facts. I do not know what is the matter; I would like to find out. Here are 100 Indian pupils located in a place a long distance from school anywhere else near to where their parents live, and they are trying to do something to improve themselves with the assistance of the whites. The Government has expended a large sum of money on this plant. It has a farm, has good grounds, and has a splendid location. The Forest Service, under work carried on by myself and others, turned over to this school in the neighborhood of three hundred and some-odd acres of forest land for the use of the school, so that the pupils might learn the conditions in connection with forestry. There are some 28 buildings remaining on this plant.

Now, it is said that because God Almighty or someone destroyed this building by fire on December 17, 1921, it should not be rebuilt. While it is stated that there is provision made for them, I dispute the fact. They will scatter them around from 100 to 500 miles, as they have done already, some at Carson City, Nev., some at Salem, Oreg., some at the Sherman Institute, in southern California, and other places, and a large part of them are not going to school at all for the lack of rebuilding this wooden building that was there, where these Indians were given an opportunity to be educated. Every man, woman, and child in that community, all the public officials, the State Superintendent of Instruction in the State of California, and other officials have written or telegraphed, and said this is necessary and that it ought to be constructed; but for some unforeseen and unknown reason that I can not find out, this school is not permitted to exist, while in the same bill a gymnasium that was destroyed by fire, costing much more than this, can be reconstructed out of the funds of the Government.

I can not get my mind to realize why the Indians located in California in Plumas County near Greenville, where they ought to have an education, where they ought to have this guiding hand to help them along, should be deprived of this right, and the remaining property of the Government stand idle and these Indians be sent away somewhere else to school and the greater part of them not be given schooling. The superintendent of instruction and the board of charities sent people up there within three weeks after the school was destroyed, and I inserted a letter in the RECORD once before which showed that these Indian pupils were not only driven from the school by the fire but that they were practically out of something upon which to subsist. Now, you appropriate for everything else. You take the land from these people right along, and you have not paid them back that which you agreed to pay, and still you are depriving them of the right to have an opportunity for education and general advancement so that they might have a chance to become self-sustaining and to become better people, because that is what will happen under the circumstances.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-four Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the third deficiency bill (H. R. 12090), found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 237 Members answered to their names, and he handed in the list of absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the third deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 12090) with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 831) to amend the proviso in paragraph 10 of section 9 of the Federal reserve act amended by the act of June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3345. An act changing the name of Keokuk Street in the county of Washington, D. C., to Military Road.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I asked leave last night, but in some confusion it was not acted on, and I now ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I made yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend in the RECORD his remarks made yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: Add a new paragraph on page 11, between lines 13 and 14, to read as follows:

"BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS—CALIFORNIA.

"For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Greenville Indian School, California, including pay of superintendent, $24,000; for general repairs and improvements, $4,000; for repair of school building on account of and by reason of the fire on December 17, 1921, to be immediately available, $60,000; in all, $88,000," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. It is impossible to repair a building which does not exist.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RAKER. This is to repair a building on account of and by reason of a fire on December 17, 1921, and in a ruling heretofore made by a chairman of the Committee of the Whole a similar amendment was held in order.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that this is the same amendment which the gentleman has heretofore offered in a different form. It is not a germane amendment. It is also plainly an appropriation of money for a purpose not authorized by law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. There has been a ruling directly by the chairman on this point involved here, the same language the Chair has ruled upon. I know the Chair has already ruled, but I wondered if the Chair had noticed that ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Not to exceed $5,000 of the appropriation of $500,000 contained in the act entitled "An act making an appropriation to enable the Department of Justice to investigate and prosecute war frauds," approved May 22, 1922, is made available for furniture and repairs, including floor coverings, file holders, and cases.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 19, after the word "for," insert the words "the purchase of," and in the same line, after the word "repairs," insert the word "thereto." And in line 20, after the word "cases" insert the words "in addition to any furniture secured from surplus war stores through the General Supply Committee."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if any of this $500,000 fund will be used to enable the prosecuting officer in this District to prosecute other than war-fraud cases?

Mr. MADDEN. That is all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know why there has been no trial of the men indicted for the Knickerbocker disaster?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That disaster occurred last winter. It was a clear case of the murder of men and women, the result of incompetency and greed.

Mr. MADDEN. They have a regular appropriation for that purpose under the district attorney.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Upward of six months have elapsed and all the evidence was in the hands of the authorities a few days after the tragedy. Nothing is being done or has been done up to this time. If there is anything that showed the necessity of reformation in court procedure, and especially in criminal procedure, it is the great delay in this case. Ninety-seven innocent persons were enticed into a place which they thought safe, and there made to suffer an agonizing death. Soldiers who had served across the seas were killed there. Some of my own personal acquaintances were among the victims—one a young woman, mother of two beautiful children. The young, the beautiful, the brave were slaughtered as the result of incompetency and greed. The facts show that it could not have been anything else. Six months have elapsed, nothing has been done, and all the witnesses within a few rods of the courthouse.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Upon what evidence does the gentleman base the statement that nothing has been done?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Because there ought to have been trials of those cases.

Mr. WALSH. There has been something done. The gentleman probably has not followed the Washington papers recently. There were demurrers filed in those cases. Arguments have been had, I believe, in all cases except one, and they are awaiting the decision of the court.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How long ago?

Mr. WALSH. Within the last two weeks.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then it took five months before they had any hearing.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman well knows that they were indicted within 60 days after the accident happened. There were many other cases pending at that time, and the district attorney has to have some order of procedure for cases.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There could be no other case comparable in importance to the killing of 97 persons in that theater. I know that there are powerful influences which will prevent the trial of these cases as long as it can be prevented. I myself years ago was an officer in charge of prosecutions, and I know how money, guilty money, will do anything to delay prosecutions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am sure we are very much gratified to have the intimation conveyed to the people of the District that guilty money is probably being used to delay the trial of cases, when as a matter of fact the indictments were found, I think, within 60 days after the accident happened. I have not talked with any official connected with the district attorney's office in this city, but there is no reason why these cases, when the demurrers have been settled, if the contention of the Government is sustained, should not receive a speedy trial. I do not know of anything that has happened which would furnish the basis of a statement that any undue or improper means is being exerted upon the prosecuting officer to delay the trial in these cases. There are other cases pending in the District where people have lost their lives as a result of willful premeditation on somebody's part. These cases have not been tried. Of course, I can understand that people who have lost friends and relatives and acquaintances in such a catastrophe should want to take the owner, the builder, the architect, and the inspector out and hang them on the nearest telegraph pole. However, this is considerable of a District. It has its full share of crimes, misdemeanors, murders, accidents which involve criminal responsibility, and I believe that the district attorney's office is keeping pace with the work. The cases are filed in court, and the orderly way, as the gentleman well knows, is to take the cases up in the order in which they are filed.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. There was an investigation, a jury of inquest impaneled, and the district attorney's office took charge of the inquest to fix the responsibility, and that hearing extended over a period of some three or four weeks, did it not?

Mr. WALSH. That is so. That was later followed up by the presentation of the case to the grand jury, and I think it hardly becoming that simply because these cases have not been brought to trial an insinuation should be made that guilty money or improper influence is being used to keep these parties who have been indicted from having a trial, when, as a matter of fact, there have been several questions of law raised which must be determined by the court, and they are under consideration by the court at the present time. From what I have read in the local press a very unique question of law was raised in this particular case. I assume that the court which heard the argument upon the demurrer is giving the matter consideration, and when the question is determined, if the contention of the prosecution is sustained, the cases will be tried in due course and the guilty parties punished.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Aberdeen Proving Ground, Md., $174,591.63; in all, $4,140,105.72.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee whether the amounts carried in the various items in the paragraphs under "Quartermaster Corps" which have just been read for the purchase of sites are the aggregate amounts authorized in the authorization act?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; they are.

Mr. STAFFORD. There were no reductions in the amounts from those that were authorized to be expended?

Mr. MADDEN. No. The awards were all made, contracts were entered into, and the obligation exists. The authorization was not made in the act until the amount was ascertained.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is merely carrying out some prior executed agreement as to the purchase of the property.

Mr. MADDEN. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. And when these amounts are appropriated there will be no other appropriations necessary for the acquirement of additional real estate for war activities.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. In reference to the Quartermaster warehouse in Baltimore and the Aberdeen Proving Ground and these other items to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers, it is my understanding that they were passed on by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And the amounts were the claims approved, except where they were necessarily cut down by the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. We did not cut them down. We allowed the amounts which are allotted in the act or obligated by the Government under the contract.

Mr. HILL. And all of these items are as they came from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. Exactly.

The Clerk read as follows:

CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

Readjustment of contracts: For amounts found to be due various contractors under the provisions of section 10, river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919, on certain contracts for work on river and harbor improvements entered into but not completed prior to April 6, 1917, for work performed between April 6, 1917, and July 18, 1918, as set forth in detail in reports of the Chief of Engineers forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by letters of the Secretary of War as published in House Documents Nos. 205 and 219, Sixty-seventh Congress, $210,535.66.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. This is the third and last of a group of settlements which were authorized to be made by the Corps of Engineers in connection with the river and harbor work under contracts that were entered into between April 6, 1917, and July 18, 1918.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand that. That is the language of the paragraph, but did the expenditure go beyond the amount appropriated by the Congress for that purpose?

Mr. MADDEN. The Congress did not appropriate. Congress never appropriates until the settlements are made, and there have been three series of settlements and this is the last one.

Mr. DOWELL. This is done on the authorization?

Mr. MADDEN. Under the act of Congress.

Mr. DOWELL. Without any appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. Without any appropriation. These people have not had their money on this at all. This is the last settlement of all of the contracts under that act.

The Clerk read as follows:

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS.

The provision contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1921, approved June 16, 1921, extending until June 30, 1922, the availability of the amounts of unexpended balances of appropriations chargeable with the settlement of claims resulting from the suspension or termination of contracts or other procurement obligations of the War Department and with the adjustment of claims under the act of Congress approved March 2, 1919, where the contract or obligation was entered into subsequently to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, is hereby extended to June 30, 1923, subject to the restriction that the balances so extended shall be used exclusively to settle the claims of foreign governments and their nationals for supplies or services furnished the American forces abroad: Provided, That the balances of appropriations herein extended may also be used to settle the claims of foreign governments and their nationals where the contract or obligation was incurred between November 12, 1918, and June 30, 1919, both dates inclusive: Provided, That such amounts of the appropriations of the War Department for the fiscal year 1920 as may be necessary to effect settlements of the claims of foreign governments and their nationals properly payable from said appropriations may be withheld from cover into the surplus funds of the Treasury and remain available until June 30, 1923: Provided further, That the total amount of the appropriations herein extended shall not exceed $3,203,000, which amount shall constitute one fund on the books of the Treasury Department: Provided further, That in the event any commission or authorized committee is sent abroad to adjust the claims mentioned herein, such expenses (not to exceed $30,000) as are necessary for such commission or committee properly to perform its duties shall be payable from the funds herein extended, including traveling expenses, and such allowances to civilian members of such commission or committee and employees sent therewith, for actual expenses in lieu of subsistence, not to exceed $10 per day, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "the," in line 16, page 17, after the word "settle."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 17, line 16, after the word "settle," strike out the word "the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In July, nearly a year ago, the Government requested bids on Muscle Shoals.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon talking about Muscle Shoals at the present time. We are going to have that question up a little later this afternoon.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order. I do so because of important legislation I hope to get. If——

Mr. SEARS. While the entire country is interested in this question, I realize it is not now in order to discuss it if anyone objects, and I shall therefore wait until it is in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act hereafter may be referred to as the "third deficiency act, fiscal year 1922."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the hearings upon this bill, I made a request of an Army officer representing the War Department that a copy of a certain order be extended in the hearings. Through an oversight, as explained in the accompanying letter to the chairman of the committee, that order was not included, and under the permission that has just been granted I shall place the order in the RECORD in full.

At this time I shall take just a moment to call the attention of the committee to Paragraph VI, General Order 20, from the Chief of Staff, promulgated May 15 by the Secretary of War. The order reads in part:

The Secretary of War authorizes and desires public and private discussions on appropriate occasions by officers of the Army in support of the military policy of the United States as established by law and of the policies of the War Department in furtherance thereof designed to secure the national defense.

Then omitting a large portion—

As the policies involved have been worked out with much care after a very full consideration of all the factors entering into the problem, it is desired, in order to avoid confusion, that they should be discussed from the standpoint of the War Department unless special authority for a different presentation is obtained from The Adjutant General of the Army.

In other words, the Secretary of War makes a special request to the 12,000 officers of the Army to go out and spread propaganda in behalf of the program laid down by the General Staff as long as they will promote that particular proposition, but serves notice on them that if they want to vary in their judgment in any way they must come and get special permission to speak. In other words, that lays down in this country a program making the General Staff of the Army supreme, teaching in this country a doctrine that has been repudiated in other countries of the world as a menace to democracy, and I believe that the order deserves the attentive study of the Members of the House. Nothing led Germany to militarism more than the dominance of the general staff over the thought of the country. We do not want to follow the path that led Germany to ruin and the world to desolation, even though Weeks be the guide.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CRAMTON. For a brief one.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman know of any order issued by the General Staff to the other officers that before reporting to any committee of Congress they must report to the staff and give information as to what they are to give to the committee?

Mr. CRAMTON. I might say this: In the same hearing when I made that request, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the Army appropriation bill, made the following statement (hearings third deficiency appropriation bill, p. 255):

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish also there was somebody here who could answer a little further, if it is not true that officers of the War Department have been severely reprimanded for expressing, even to congressional committees, an opinion at variance with the policy of the War Department, which is true.

That significant and important statement was ignored by the War Department and the opportunity to deny Mr. ANTHONY'S charge was not availed of. It is my information that the very thing referred to by Mr. ANTHONY has very recently occurred, though it involves a dangerous effort of the military to dominate legislation.

The letter and order referred to are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CHIEF OF FINANCE,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1922.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

SIR: It is noted that on pages 254 and 255 of the hearings before your committee upon the third deficiency appropriation bill, 1922, request was made for a copy of a recent order issued by the War Department in reference to public statements made by officers regarding the military policy of the War Department. From the hearing it appears that it was desired to place such an order in the record, but through inadvertence the stenographer's notes were returned without an inclusion of the order. It is believed that the matter referred to is contained in Section VI of General Orders, No. 20, War Department, May 15, 1922, and I inclose herewith a copy of this order for your information. A copy of this letter and of the order is also being sent to Mr. CRAMTON, who, as shown by the record, made the inquiry regarding the order.

By authority of the Secretary of War.

Respectfully,

KENZIE W. WALKER,
Acting Budget Officer for the War Department.

VI. Instructions authorizing discussions of the military policy of the United States and of the War Department policies in furtherance thereof.—The Secretary of War authorizes and desires public and private discussion on appropriate occasions by officers of the Army in support of the military policy of the United States as established by law and of the policies of the War Department in furtherance thereof designed to secure the national defense.

The military policy of the United States is embodied in the national defense act of 1920. This act expresses the views of military men throughout the country, including the great mass of citizen soldiers who fought in the World War. It perpetuates the historic organizations of the American Army that saved Europe and utilizes their traditions and personnel as the foundation upon which to build future organizations of similar character. It provides for their orderly mobilization and training in their respective localities in time of war, and avoids the confusion and expense incident to the hasty assembly of untrained and unrelated personnel at extemporized and widely scattered camps.

This policy is in entire accord with the spirit of our institutions and has met with the approval of all who have given it study and consideration. The sympathetic support of the public is necessary for its maintenance, and it is to be expected that this support will be freely given when the undoubted merits of the policy are understood and when attention is called to the burdensome and dangerous alternative that must be faced unless it is made fully effective.

The national defense is the ultimate mission of the Army, and a proper presentation to the public of the necessities in this regard, since it is essential to the accomplishment of this mission, becomes naturally and logically one of the important duties of the officers of the Army.

As the policies involved have been worked out with much care after a very full consideration of all the factors entering into the problem, it is desired, in order to avoid confusion, that they should be discussed from the standpoint of the War Department unless special authority for a different presentation is obtained from The Adjutant General of the Army.

Existing orders in conflict with the foregoing provisions are modified accordingly.

By order of the Secretary of War:

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General of the Armies, Chief of Staff.

Official:
ROBERT C. DAVIS, Acting The Adjutant General.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that until the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports, and the Chair will then recognize the gentleman?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has had under consideration the bill H. R. 12090 and has directed me to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but on account of my general pair with the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. CARTER, I wish to to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on every amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "therein," insert: "and the appropriation for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1923 for payment to the Government Printing Office for heat, light, and power shall also be available for such purposes to reimburse the Capitol power plant when the connection herein provided for shall have been made.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 200, noes 6.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-four Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. Those in favor of agreeing to the amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 232, nays 3, answered "present" 1, not voting 194, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.
Mr. Davis of Minnesota with Mr. Kunz.
Mr. Patterson of New Jersey with Mr. Moore of Virginia.
Mr. Reed of New York with Mr. Stedman.
Mr. Webster with Mr. Larsen of Georgia.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 19, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "For payment to Thomas W. Harrison for expenses incurred as contestee in the contested-election case of Paul v. Harrison, audited and recommended by the Committee on Elections No. 1, $2,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 170, noes 3.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-eight Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those favoring the amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 233, nays none, answered "present" 2, not voting 195, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.

Mr. Kendall with Mr. Sumners of Texas.

Mr. Summers of Washington with Mr. Griffin.

Mr. Vare with Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. Brown of Wisconsin with Mr. Jeffers of Alabama.

Mr. Goodykoontz with Mr. Hammer.

Mr. Gorman with Mr. Dupré.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 24, after "$3,500," insert "of which $875 shall be paid to the widow of M. R. Blumenberg, late an official stenographer to committees."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 180, noes 100.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the Chair that evidently——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right, if he sees fit, to make a point of order.

Mr. VOIGT. I wish to say to the Chair that evidently there are not 280 Members present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make the point of no quorum present if he wishes to.

Mr. VOIGT. I request the Chair to put that vote over again, because I believe there is some mistake.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference what the vote was. The question is whether a quorum was present or not. The gentleman can make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. VOIGT. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and six Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as favor the amendment will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 231, nays 1, answered "present" 1, not voting 197, as follows:

And in line 20, after the word "cases," insert the words "in addition to any furniture secured from surplus war stores through the General Supply Committee."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 193, noes 20.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of no quorum is made for the purpose of delay. It seems to me that the time has arrived when this House ought to govern itself without regard to some gentleman who is sore about a post office. [Applause.] A gentleman who would delay the business of this House with trivial objections of that sort, who persists continually, everlastingly, and eternally in delaying, without cause, the public business, ought to be thwarted in his efforts. The constituencies are responsible for the men they send here, but we—collectively—are held responsible for the general result. Within the last few minutes the Chair has determined that a quorum was present.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the point of no quorum is not well founded. [Applause.]

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say something on the point of order just made by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the control of the time is in the discretion of the Chair, but as the Chair is going to rule in favor of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it does not seem necessary to hear argument on that side. The Chair thinks that regardless of what motives a man may have, anyone has at any time the right to make the point of order that there is no quorum present, if it be made in good faith. If a Member should make the point of order of no quorum at a time when it was obvious that a quorum was present, the Chair would not entertain it, but so far to-day whenever the point has been made the Chair has been really in doubt and therefore has entertained the point. The Chair is now in doubt and will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and sixteen Members present, a quorum.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 16, strike out the word "the."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 214, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 214, noes none.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a conference report and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment of the House and the amendments of the Senate thereto, insert the following:

"That annually, from and after July 1, 1922, 60 per cent of such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may appropriate for shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation and privileges, and the remaining 40 per cent by the United States, excepting such items of expense as Congress may direct shall be paid on another basis; and that in order that the District of Columbia may be able annually to comply with the provisions hereof, and also in order that the said District may be put upon a cash basis as to payment of expenses, there hereby is levied for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and 1927, a tax at such rate on the full value, and no less, of all real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia as will, when added to the revenues derived from privileges and from the tax on franchises, corporations, and public utilities, as fixed by law, and also from the tax, which hereby is levied, on such intangible personal property as is subject to taxation in the District of Columbia, at the rate of five-tenths of 1 per cent on the full market value thereof, produce money enough to pay such annual expenses as may be imposed on the District of Columbia by Congress, and in addition to such annual expenses a surplus fund sufficient to enable the District of Columbia to get upon a cash-paying basis by the end of the fiscal year 1927; and that beginning with July 1, 1922, and annually thereafter, one-half of the tax levied upon taxable real and personal property in the District of Columbia shall become due and payable on the 1st day of November of each year and the other half of such tax shall become due and payable on the 1st day of May of each year; and if either said installment of such tax shall not be paid within 30 days of the date it is due and payable, said installment shall thereupon be in arrears and delinquent; and there shall then be added, to be collected with such tax, a penalty at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon the amount thereof for the period of such delinquency, said delinquency to date from the date such installment was due and payable, and the whole together shall constitute the delinquent tax, to be dealt with and collected in the manner now provided by law; and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix such rate of taxation as will, when applied to the aforesaid property in accordance with the levies and values hereinbefore mentioned, produce the said sums of money;

and that until July 1, 1927, the Treasury Department may continue to make advancements toward the payment of the expenses of the District of Columbia as has been done during preceding years, but after June 30, 1927, it shall be unlawful for any money to be so advanced or for any money whatever to be paid out of the Treasury for District purposes, unless the District, at the time of such payment, has to its credit in the Treasury money enough to pay the full per cent required of it; and that for the purpose of defraying such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may from time to time appropriate for, there hereby is levied for each and every fiscal year succeeding that ending June 30, 1927, a tax at such rate on the aforesaid property subject to taxation in the District (the rate fixed herein on intangible personal property not to be made less but which may be increased by the commissioners in their discretion to any rate not in excess of the rate imposed upon real estate) as will, when added to the other taxes and revenues of the District, produce money enough to enable the District to pay promptly and in full all sums directed by Congress to be paid by the District, and for which appropriation has been duly made; and that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby are empowered and directed to ascertain, determine, and fix annually such rate of taxation as will, when applied as aforesaid, produce the money needed to defray the share of the expenses of the District during the year for which the rate is fixed; and that the Commissioners of the District shall, in accordance with existing law, cause all such taxes and revenues to be promptly collected and, when collected, to be daily deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the District for the purposes herein set out; and that on July 1, 1922, the Treasury Department shall open, and thereafter accurately keep, an account showing all receipts and disbursements relative to the revenues and expenditures of the District of Columbia, and shall also show the sources of the revenue, the purpose of expenditure, and the appropriation under which the expenditure is made; and that from and after June 30, 1922, any and all revenue derived from property not owned wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, as between the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be the property of the United States; and that after June 30, 1922, where the United States is the owner of ground or the holder thereof in trust for the public, upon which improvements have been made at the joint expense of the United States and the District of Columbia, the revenues therefrom shall first be used to pay the United States 3 per cent of the full value of the ground as a ground rent, and the remainder shall be divided between them in the same proportion that each contributed to said improvements, and for such purposes the assessor for the District of Columbia shall fix the full value of the ground after he has first made oath that he will fairly and impartially appraise the same; and that after June 30, 1922, any revenue derived from any activity or source whatever, including motor-vehicle licenses, not otherwise herein disposed of, which activity or source of revenue is appropriated for by both the United States and the District of Columbia, shall be divided between the two in the same proportion that each has contributed thereto; and that if, for any fiscal year after June 30, 1927, the District of Columbia should raise and deposit in the Treasury to its credit, as herein provided, more money derived from taxation, privileges, and other sources authorized herein than may be necessary for the purposes herein set out, such excess shall be available the succeeding year, in the discretion of the commissioners, either for the purpose of meeting the expense chargeable to the District of Columbia and/or for the further purpose of enabling the commissioners to fix a lower rate of taxation for the year following the one in which said excess accrued than they might otherwise be able to do; and that after June 30, 1922, the agencies through which the District of Columbia collects its revenues derived from taxation shall also collect for the United States any revenues which by this act become the sole property of the United States, and said revenues shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as "Miscellaneous Receipts," but the revenues from the property known as Center Market shall not be so collected; and that hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not be restricted in submitting to the Bureau of the Budget their estimates of the needs of the District, but they shall, as near as may be, bring them within the probable aggregate of the fixed proportionate appropriations to be paid by the United States and the District of Columbia.

"A joint select committee, composed of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is created and is authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874, with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District. Neither the cost of construction nor of maintenance of any building erected or owned by the United States for the purpose of transacting therein the business of the Government of the United States shall be considered by said committee. And in event any money may be, or at any time has been by Congress or otherwise, found due, either legally or morally, from the one to the other, on account of loans, advancements, or improvements made, upon which interest has not been paid by either to the other, then such sums as have been or may be found due from one to the other, shall be considered as bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from the time when the principal should, either legally or morally, have been paid, until actually paid. And the committee shall also ascertain and report what surplus, if any, the District of Columbia has to its credit on the books of the Treasury of the United States which has been acquired by taxation or from licenses. And the said committee shall report its findings relative to all matters hereby referred to it to the Senate and House, respectively, on or before the first Monday in February, 1923. The chairman or acting chairman of said committee hereby is empowered to administer oaths or affirmations. The committee also is empowered to compel witnesses to attend its meetings and to testify, and also to compel the production of such books and papers as it may deem desirable. Any person who has been duly notified to appear before the committee either as witness or witness duces tecum, and fails so to do, shall be deemed guilty of contempt of Congress, and therefor may be punished to such extent as either the Senate or the House may determine; and said committee shall determine whether the proceeding for contempt shall lie with the House or the Senate. The committee may employ such accountants and stenographers to assist in the work as may be necessary, but the same qualifications for such accountants shall be required as was required of accountants by section 6 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled 'An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' and no one shall be so employed as accountant who is or has been heretofore an officer or employee of the District of Columbia or the United States. No employee of said committee shall be paid more than $25 a day while actually at work. The Attorney General of the United States hereby is authorized and directed to assign a competent attorney from his regular force of attorneys to represent the United States before said committee; and any Member of Congress shall be permitted to examine any witness and argue any question before the committee. For the payment of salaries of accountants and stenographers, for printing and binding, and other necessary expenses of the committee, there is appropriated 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, the sum of $20,000, to be paid out upon vouchers approved by the chairman or acting chairman of the committee.

"That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with any provision of this act are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict but no further.

"That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, hereby is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia and the advances from the Federal Treasury herein permitted, namely:"

And the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The action recommended in the accompanying report adopts the amendment of the House adjusting the fiscal relations of the District of Columbia and the Federal Government, modified in the following particulars:

It provides that the authority of the commissioners to increase the rate of taxation on intangible personal property shall not be exercised to increase that rate to a rate in excess of the rate fixed on real property.

It provides for the semiannual payment of real and personal property taxes instead of the annual payment as now provided by law.

It provides for a joint select committee of Congress to investigate and report to Congress not later than the first Monday in February, 1923, on the fiscal transactions and relationships between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia, commencing with July 1, 1874.

BEN JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, this conference report——

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and six Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper closed the doors and the Sergeant at Arms was notified to bring in absentees.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 241 Members answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. On the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to dispense with further proceedings under the call will the Chair inform the House as to whether there is any method by which the House can hold this quorum after it gets it? Is it not a fact that almost every fellow runs out of the Hall the moment the roll is concluded, and is it fair to the rest of us, who are here and stay here, to have these interminable roll calls?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty, of course, of each Member to be present and stay present. The Chair knows of no method by which——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the House refuses to suspend further hearings under the call you will hold them here?

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily. The Chair does not think it is possible by any physical restraint to hold Members here. The Chair thinks the only restraint is the man's sense of duty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If enough Members would sign a paper saying they would remain here during the business of the session they would be here, but they do not do it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk began reading the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The statement is longer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I withdraw the request.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 18½, 40, 43, 58, 66, 67, 68, 72, 73, 84, 91, 92, 98, 110, 113, 121, 128, 137, 138, 142, 143, 144, 181, 194, 195, 201, 210, 213, 215, 233, 237, 238, and 239.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 12, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 32, 42, 44, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 56, 59, 62, 63, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 88, 90, 93, 95, 97, 99, 100, 104, 105, 107, 108, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 123, 125, 126, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 139, 140, 141, 145, 147, 148, 149, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 169, 169½, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 192, 193, 202, 206, 207, 209, 211, 212, 217, 219, 223, 226, 227, and 228, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$162,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$119,270"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$115,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$30,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$60,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "For expenses incident to completion of the work of furnishing to adjutants general of States and the District of Columbia statements of service of all persons from those States and the District of Columbia who entered the military service during the war with Germany, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, $230,000, to be immediately available"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the numbered proposed insert "six"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$53,020"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Pay of officers: For pay of officers of the line and staff $33,890,771: Provided, That after January 1, 1923, the sum herein appropriated for the pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 12,000 commissioned officers on the active list of the Regular Army and the emergency officers in service undergoing physical reconstruction: Provided further, That on and after January 1, 1923, there shall be officers as now authorized by law except that there shall be 420 colonels, 577 lieutenant colonels, 1,575 majors, 3,150 captains, 2,967 first lieutenants, and 1,771 second lieutenants, and these numbers shall not be exceeded except as hereinafter provided; 983 officers of the Medical Corps, 158 officers of the Dental Corps, 126 officers of the Veterinary Corps, 72 officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 125 chaplains; and the numbers herein provided shall include the officers of Philippine Scouts who shall continue to be carried on the promotion list and who shall be promoted to grades from first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, in the same manner as prescribed by law for other officers on the promotion list: Provided further, That prior to January 1, 1923, there shall be no promotions to grades below brigadier general of officers of the Regular Army except of officers of the Medical Department and chaplains, and vacancies now existing in any grade below brigadier general not actually filled by the acceptance of an appointment tendered prior to the date of approval of this act shall not be filled, and beginning January 1, 1923, there shall be no promotions or appointments to any grade or to the branches of the Medical Department or chaplains that would cause the numbers herein authorized for such grade or branch to be exceeded, except that the colonels, exclusive of those in the Medical Department and professors, remaining on the active list on January 1, 1923, and not included in the 420 junior colonels on that date shall be carried as additional numbers so long as they remain in that grade and shall not prevent promotions due to vacancies occurring among the 420 authorized colonels: Provided further, That officers in excess of the numbers authorized herein and not removed from the active list by other means shall be disposed of as follows: Those of the Medical Department and chaplains shall, prior to January 1, 1923, be eliminated from the active list as hereinafter provided; those other than of the Medical Department and chaplains shall, prior to January 1, 1923, be eliminated from the active list as hereinafter provided except that not more than a total of 800 now in grades from colonel to first lieutenant inclusive shall either be continued as additional officers in their grades until absorbed, or those in grades below lieutenant colonel shall, in inverse order of standing on the promotion list beginning with the lowest on the list in each grade, be discharged and recommissioned in the next lower grade prior to January 1, 1923, and officers accepting recommission in a lower grade shall be carried on the promotion list in the positions they now occupy and shall, while serving in such lower grade, take rank among the officers of the Regular Army in accordance with their length of service notwithstanding the date of their new commission; and any officer shall be eligible for recommission and service in the branch in which now commissioned; officers selected for elimination of less than 10 years' commissioned service may, upon recommendation of the board herein provided for, be discharged with one year's pay; or those of more than 10 years' and less than 20 years' commissioned service may, upon recommendation of the board, be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service; or those of more than 20 years' commissioned service may, upon recommendation of the board, be placed on the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of such commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent: Provided further, That of the 800 or less officers to be absorbed or recommissioned under the preceding proviso, a suitable number of officers in grades from colonel to first lieutenant, inclusive, shall be continued as additional until absorbed and a suitable number in each grade from major to first lieutenant shall be recommissioned in the next lower grade, such suitable numbers to be determined by the President upon the recommendation of the board of general officers hereinafter provided for: Provided further, That commissioned service for the purposes of this act shall include only active commissioned service in the Army performed while under appointment from the United States Government whether in the Regular, provisional, or temporary forces: Provided further, That any officer of less than 10 years' commissioned service but of more than 20 years' service accredited toward retirement or for increased pay for length of service may, in lieu of discharge with one year's pay as hereinbefore provided, if he so elects, be appointed a warrant officer and carried as an additional number in that grade; or he may, if he so elects, be retired with the rank of warrant officer with pay at the rate of 2 per cent of the pay of a warrant officer multiplied by the number of years of such accredited service: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall convene a board of five general officers which may include retired officers, whose call to active duty for this purpose is hereby authorized, which board, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, shall recommend to the President the officers to be eliminated from the active list under the provisions of this act, the number of officers in various grades to be recommissioned in the next lower grade as hereinbefore provided, and the number of officers in various grades to be continued as additional until absorbed as hereinbefore provided: Provided further, That officers shall be assigned to the several branches of the Army so that the number assigned to any branch, except of the Medical Department and chaplains, shall be 70 per cent of the number prescribed for such branch under the act of June 4, 1920, but the President may increase or diminish the number of officers assigned to any branch by not more than a total of 30 per cent."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying report:

On No. 1: Adds the words "and for other purposes" to the enacting clause of the bill, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 2, 3, and 4, relating to salaries in the office of the Secretary of War: Provides for six messengers and four assistant messengers, as proposed by the Senate, instead of seven messengers and five assistant messengers, as proposed by the House.

On No. 5, relating to the appropriation for contingencies of the Army: Substitutes the word "or" for the word "and," as proposed by the Senate, making either the "approval" or "authority" of the Secretary of War necessary for expenditures from this appropriation, instead of both the "approval" and "authority" necessary, as proposed by the House.

On No. 6, relating to the appropriation for contingencies, Military Intelligence Division, General Staff: Appropriates $162,500 instead of $225,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $100,000, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, relating to salaries, office of the Chief of Staff: Provides for 20 clerks at $1,400, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 18, as proposed by the House; provides for 20 clerks at $1,200, as proposed by the House, instead of 21, as proposed by the Senate; and provides for 2 messengers at $840 and 6 at $720, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 3 at $840 and 9 at $720, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 13, 14, and 15, relating to military post exchanges: Appropriates $115,000 instead of $200,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $75,000, as proposed by the House, and places limitations on expenditures for libraries and hostess houses of $30,000 and $60,000, respectively, instead of $60,000 and $90,000, respectively, as proposed by the Senate, and $15,000 and $35,000, respectively, as proposed by the House.

On No. 16, relating to supplies, equipment, etc., for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Appropriates $3,100,000 instead of $3,600,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $2,750,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 17, relating to military supplies and equipment for schools and colleges: Appropriates $500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $804, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 18, 18½, 19, and 20, relating to civilian military training camps: Provides, as proposed by the Senate, that the appropriation may be used for certain incidental expenses authorized by law in connection with the establishment and maintenance of civilian military training camps, in addition to the purposes covered by the language of the House bill; strikes out a provision inserted by the Senate that no funds other than those pertaining to this appropriation may be used in connection with civilian military training camps; provides that the appropriation shall not be used for the training of any person over the age of 27, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 35, as proposed by the House; and increases from 30, as proposed by the Senate, to 35 the maximum age of veterans of the War with Germany who, in a provision inserted by the Senate, are made an exception to the prohibition against the use of this appropriation for the training of any person over the age of 27.

On Nos. 21, 22, and 23, relating to salaries, office of the Adjutant General: Provides for 18 messengers and 35 assistant messengers, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 21 messengers and 43 assistant messengers, as proposed by the House.

On No. 12, relating to the appropriation for general service schools, Fort Leavenworth, Kans: Adds language proposed by the Senate making this appropriation applicable to payment for clerical services.

On No. 24, relating to the appropriation for furnishing service records to adjutant generals of States and the District of Columbia: Appropriates $230,000 instead of $250,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $202,000, as proposed by the House, and employs the language of the House bill modified so as to add "and the District of Columbia" to the language of the paragraph so as to include the adjutant general of the District of Columbia with the adjutant generals to be furnished service records.

On Nos. 25, 26, and 27, relating to salaries, office of the Inspector General: Provides for two clerks of class 4, as provided by the Senate, instead of one, as proposed by the House, and eliminates one assistant messenger proposed by the House.

On Nos. 28, 29, and 30, relating to salaries, office of the Judge Advocate General: Provides for six clerks of class 2, instead of seven, as proposed by the Senate, and five as proposed by the House; provides for one assistant messenger at $720, as proposed by the Senate, instead of three, as proposed by the House.

On No. 31, relating to commissioned officers of the Regular Army: Provides an appropriation of $33,890,771 for a maximum of 12,000 commissioned officers (including funds for pay for the officers who are to be eliminated), and authorizes a permanent commissioned personnel of 12,000. The Senate provided an appropriation of $35,390,438 for an average number of 12,531 during the fiscal year, with a maximum of 13,000 during the fiscal year and an authorized permanent number of 14,000. The House provided an appropriation of $26,896,200 for 11,000 officers during the fiscal year. The substitute also provides for the elimination, demotion, or absorption of those officers found surplus in their grades or branches.

On Nos. 32 and 33, relating to the appropriation for pay and allowances of the Officers' Reserve Corps: Adds the words "and allowances" to the language of the appropriation, as proposed by the Senate, and appropriates $1,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $250,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 34, relating to warrant officers: Provides an appropriation of $1,800,000 for pay of warrant officers instead of $1,951,632, as proposed by the Senate, and $1,534,336, as proposed by the House; strikes out a provision, proposed by the Senate, that in effecting the reduction of warrant officers such officers may upon their own application be placed on the unlimited retired list after 30 years' service and may compute for retirement such double time as they may have earned while serving as enlisted men; provides, as proposed by the Senate, that nothing contained in the language of the paragraph shall prevent the appointment of qualified band leaders for authorized bands; and strikes out a provision, proposed by the Senate, that no vacancies in the grade of warrant officer in the Army Mine Planter Service shall be filled until the number in such grade has been reduced to 40, and thereafter the number shall not be increased above 40, and substitutes a provision that the number of warrant officers in the Army Mine Planter Service shall be reduced to 40 within 60 days after the approval of the act, instead of requiring the reduction to 40 at the beginning of the fiscal year, as proposed by the House.

On No. 35, relating to the appropriation for aviation increase to officers of the Army: Appropriates $950,000 instead of $1,021,840, as proposed by the Senate, and $846,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 36, relating to additional pay to officers for length of service: Appropriates $5,209,784 instead of $5,440,317, as proposed by the Senate, and $4,000,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 37, relating to enlisted men of the Army: Appropriates $56,866,399 for pay of 125,000 enlisted men, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts, instead of $60,981,795 for 133,000 enlisted men, exclusive of Philippine Scouts, as proposed by the Senate, and $48,863,088 for 115,000 enlisted men, exclusive of Philippine Scouts, as proposed by the House; provides that the total authorized number of enlisted men, exclusive of Philippine Scouts, shall be 125,000, instead of 140,000, as proposed by the Senate, and 115,000, as proposed by the House; and strikes out a provision proposed by the House directing the Secretary of War to grant applications for discharge of enlisted men serving in continental United States without regard to the provisions of existing law respecting discharges until the number in the Army has been reduced to 115,000 exclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

On No. 38, relating to pay of enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps: Appropriates $5,000 instead of $7,500, as proposed by the Senate, and $100, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 39 and 40, relating to aviation increase to enlisted men of the Army: Appropriates $200,000 instead of $216,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $150,000, as proposed by the House; and provides, as proposed by the House, that this appropriation shall not be available for increased pay on flying status to more than 500 enlisted men.

On No. 210, relating to repairs to the Arlington Memorial Amphitheater and Chapel: Strikes out an additional appropriation of $15,000 for this purpose, proposed by the Senate.

On No. 211: Strikes out an appropriation of $20,000 proposed by the House for reconditioning the road from Fort Gibson, Okla., to the Fort Gibson National Cemetery.

On No. 212, relating to the appropriation for furnishing headstones for unmarked graves of soldiers: Strikes out a limitation proposed by the House prohibiting the use of this appropriation for the purchase of headstones of a design different from that heretofore furnished for the graves of Union and Confederate soldiers.

On Nos. 213, 215, 216, 217, and 218, relating to the appropriation for disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees: Strikes out language proposed by the Senate providing for the disposition of remains of contract surgeons in lieu of acting assistant surgeons, as proposed by the House; strikes out language proposed by the Senate providing for reimbursement for expenses of burial of certain civilian employees of the War Department; provides a reappropriation of $543,320, instead of $1,143,720 as proposed by the Senate and $400,000 as proposed by the House; adds language, proposed by the Senate, providing for the care and maintenance of graves of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees of the Army abroad; extends until June 30, 1923, the availability of funds made available in Public Resolution No. 44, Sixty-seventh Congress, for the purchase of real estate and improvement of cemeteries in Europe for American military dead; provides that $4,000,000 of the unobligated balance of the appropriation for disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civil employees for the fiscal years 1920, 1921, and 1922 shall be carried to the surplus fund instead of $3,000,000 as proposed by the Senate and $5,600,000 as proposed by the House.

On No. 219, relating to the appropriation for repair and preservation of monuments, etc., constructed by the United States in Cuba and China to mark the places where American soldiers fell: Appropriates $1,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $100, as proposed by the House.

On No. 222, relating to the appropriation for completing the construction of a reflecting pool in West Potomac Park: Appropriates $75,000, instead of $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $50,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 223, relating to the survey of northern and northwestern lakes: Appropriates $75,000 for this purpose, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $107,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 224, relating to the construction and maintenance of military and post roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska: Appropriates $465,000 for this purpose, instead of $500,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $425,000, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 226, 227, and 228, relating to the appropriation for transportation facilities on inland and coastwise waterways: Appropriates $330,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $30,000, as proposed by the House, and inserts language proposed by the Senate providing that not to exceed $30,000 of this appropriation may be used for payment of employees of the War Department, instead of providing an outright appropriation of $30,000 for this purpose, as proposed by the House, and places a limit of $4,000 on one employee who may be paid from this appropriation, as proposed by the Senate, instead of a limit of $4,500, as proposed by the House.

On No. 229, relating to the appropriations for all branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers except the Central Branch: Substitutes language proposed by the Senate for that proposed by the House, the amounts remaining the same as proposed by the House except in the case of the Eastern Branch, where an appropriation of $40,000 is made for current expenses instead of $47,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $38,000, as proposed by the House; and an appropriation of $100,000 is made for subsistence instead of $105,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $95,000, as proposed by the House; and in the case of the Danville Branch, where an appropriation of $100,000 is made for household, as proposed by the House, instead of $110,000, as proposed by the Senate; an appropriation of $85,000 is made for hospital instead of $90,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $80,000, as proposed by the House; and an appropriation of $35,000 is made for repairs instead of $40,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $30,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 231: Corrects the total of the appropriations for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, making it $4,500,800 instead of $4,532,800, as proposed by the Senate, and $4,483,800, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, and 239, relating to the Panama Canal: Adds language proposed by the Senate providing that the limitations on the expenditure of appropriations made in the act shall not apply to the appropriations for the Panama Canal, modified so as to apply only to limitations on appropriations for salaries and wages of civilian employees; strikes out language proposed by the Senate authorizing an allowance of not to exceed $4,000 to the Governor of the Panama Canal for expenses of entertainment, to be paid from funds of the Panama Railroad Co.; appropriates $525,000 for sanitation instead of $550,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $500,000, as proposed by the House; appropriates $930,000 for civil government instead of $950,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $915,000, as proposed by the House; corrects the total of appropriations for the Panama Canal, making it $4,114,434 instead of $4,159,434, as proposed by the Senate, and $4,074,434, as proposed by the House; restores language stricken out by the Senate providing that the Governor of the Panama Canal shall purchase needed material, etc., from available reserve stocks of the War Department; restores language stricken out by the Senate providing that no part of the appropriations for the Panama Canal shall be used to pay the salary for any position at a rate in excess of the rate in effect for such position on June 30, 1921; strikes out language proposed by the Senate excepting the permanent operating organization from the prohibition against employment of any greater number of persons than are specified in the notes submitted in connection with the Budget and the payment to any person of any greater rate of compensation than was authorized for the same or like positions on July 1, 1921.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On No. 41, relating to additional pay for length of service to enlisted men.

On No. 65, providing that all sums under the head of "Pay of the Army" shall constitute one fund for disbursement purposes.

On No. 106, relating to the construction of apartment buildings at Fort Benning, Ga.

On No. 131, relating to the making of contracts by the Air Service.

On No. 199, providing that all sums under the head of "Pay of the Military Academy" shall constitute one fund for purposes of disbursement.

On No. 214, relative to the payment of expenses incident to the disposition of remains of members of the Army Nurse Corps.

On Nos. 220 and 221, relating to the medical and surgical history of the World War.

On No. 225, appropriating $7,500,000 for continuing construction work at Muscle Shoals, Ala.

On No. 230, relating to the expenditure of moneys allotted to the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers by the United States Veterans' Bureau.

D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
WILLIAM H. STAFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 1, noes 165.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. The point of no quorum does not lie on a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated.

Mr. VOIGT. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a point of no quorum on the vote.

Mr. VOIGT. But I now make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the bill making appropriations for the War Department for the next fiscal year as it comes back to the House as a result of the conference provides for 125,000 enlisted men for the Regular Army and provides for a maximum of 12,000 commissioned officers. As regards the amounts, the bill as it passed the House carried $287,897,731.67. As it passed the Senate it carried $341,377,851.67. There was added by the Senate $53,480,120, and the amount of the bill, assuming concurrence in the items which are offered to the House now, amounts to $325,164,492.67, making a decrease in the Senate bill of $16,213,359.

The bill now represents an increase over the bill as it passed the House of $37,266,761. The Budget estimates covering the items appropriated in this bill amounted to $359,360,917.47, and the cut in the estimates as presented in the bill now before you represents $34,196,424.80. The 1922 appropriations, including deficiencies for these purposes, totaled $388,696,033.22. So that the bill now before you is less than the 1922 appropriation in the amount of $63,531,540.55, representing a substantial saving in the appropriations for these activities for the next fiscal year as compared with the cost of the present. [Applause.]

As divided between the military and nonmilitary activities covered in the bill, the appropriation for the military activities of the Government amount to $256,411,169.67; for the nonmilitary activities, $68,753,323. It is not my purpose at this time to go into any great detail in regard to the different items covered in the bill, except to state that the conferees between the House and the Senate have come to practically a complete agreement, the items remaining and which will be submitted to the House being largely of a technical or of a legislative character and of no great import, with the exception of the item making the appropriation for the completion of Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, which is inserted in the bill by the Senate, providing for $7,500,000. Because of the fact that the House had not considered this item, and of its great importance, it was deemed wise to disagree to the Senate amendment and bring the matter here, so that the House would have an opportunity to express itself.

At the proper time a motion will be made to recede and concur in the amendment, as your representatives felt that the completion of Dam No. 2 at Muscle Shoals was absolutely essential and a business proposition, and stood on its merits, regardless of any propositions that have been made for the purchase of the Government activities there, or whether the Government should operate them itself. After careful investigation and hearings your conferees believe that Dam No. 2 should be completed, and $7,500,000 will carry on the work for the next fiscal year. It will take $28,000,000 to complete the construction, and when finished it will furnish the greatest single supply of hydroelectric power in this country, and we believe that its value to the Government or to whoever may ultimately acquire it will be many millions of dollars more than its cost, large as it will be.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman give some time on this side in reference to the discussion of the Muscle Shoals matter?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that when we reach that item it is the purpose to allow a reasonable amount of debate.

Mr. OLIVER. Some parties may differ with the gentleman——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have an understanding with the chairman of the conference committee that we will dispose of the noncontested items first, and then yield time on the Muscle Shoals item. Will the chairman of the conference committee, if he has finished, yield a few minutes to me?

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Five minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I did not sign the conference report. I did all that I could to get the conferees together. I did not do anything to prevent an agreement. I could not have prevented one; but my friends from the House on the conference were more than considerate of me and my views. The conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate understood my position in reference to the size of the Army. I did not consent to the increase of the Army because I think 115,000 men are more than sufficient. In fact, in my judgment, 100,000 men are sufficient. Nor did I agree to the 12,000 officers. I think that 9,000 officers are enough.

As has been called to your attention by the chairman of the conference committee, the pay of the officers on the active list of the Army was $26,896,200. The Senate fixed the amount at $35,390,438, and the conference agreed to $23,830,771. This increase was, in round figures, about $7,000,000 on the pay of the officers alone. The pay of the reserve officers in the House was $250,000. The Senate fixed the amount at $2,000,000 and the conference at $1,000,000. The pay of the enlisted men as it left the House was $48,863,088; the Senate wanted $60,981,795, and the conference agreed on $56,866,399.

Now, I could not believe at this time that we were warranted in these increases of the Army. For that reason, and that alone, I did not sign the conference report. There is in this bill the rivers and harbors item, the Panama Railroad item, and the Military Academy, Muscle Shoals, and other items that were not objectionable to me. I believe that in a bill made up as this one is that there ought to be some change in the rules, so that these entirely separate and distinct bills might each stand on its own merit, so as not to compel the conferees to sign a conference report except as to related items like all the military appropriation bill. And if you take the Military Establishment itself, the House conferees did, in my judgment, a splendid piece of work. And I think also that the House conferees are to be congratulated in securing as low an agreement as they did on the Army and on the number of officers, taking into consideration the attitude of the Senate; but I am so utterly opposed to a large standing Army that I could not sign the conference report.

Now, I have taken this time of the committee in order that I might let the House know why I did not sign the conference report.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman know how many Philippine Scouts there are?

Mr. SISSON. There are about 7,500.

Mr. RICKETTS. Are they included in the Army of 125,000?

Mr. SISSON. No.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does the gentleman remember the number of Army officers provided for in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SISSON. Eleven thousand.

Mr. RICKETTS. You increase them by 1,000?

Mr. SISSON. No; I do not; but the conference report does.

Mr. RICKETTS. How much is the appropriation increased by reason of this increase?

Mr. SISSON. I just stated it a moment ago.

Mr. RICKETTS. I did not catch it.

Mr. SISSON. The pay of the officers as the bill left the House was $26,896,200. As it left the Senate it was $35,390,438, and the conference report is $33,890,771; and as to the enlisted men, as it passed the House it was $48,863,088, and as agreed upon in conference it is $56,866,399.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman has called the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the pay of officers was based not upon the act of June, 1920, but the old pay scale act.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I think it is fair to state it, and I am glad that my colleague has called my attention to it, because the House conferees, in my judgment, were warranted by the action of the House in agreeing to a large portion of this increase. I do not mean the conferees were warranted by the action of the House in the increased number of officers, but in the increase of salaries, because the House has passed a pay scale bill which has also been passed by the Senate, and, of course, the House had to agree to the salaries fixed by both the House and Senate in that bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As to the provision for 125,000 men, is it not a fact that practically there will not be that many enlisted men in the Army? Practically there will be not more than 110,000 or 112,000 men on the average.

Mr. SISSON. Of course that is problematical, but they will not have at any time, in my judgment, a full and complete enlistment. The maximum being 125,000 men, in my judgment, there will be a leeway there always of about 5,000 men. It will depend on the amount of campaigning done by officers of the Army in the process of recruiting.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Well, as to the officers——

Mr. SISSON. In the same way the number of officers will be dropped down to about 11,400, perhaps, by the 1st of January, so that there will be certain vacancies that can be filled by those men who come in at the lower grades as officers. I think it is absolutely essential that that provision should go into the bill.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KOPP. How much does this bill carry for military activities?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. In round figures, I think it is over $226,000,000.

Mr. KOPP. How much was appropriated for military activities for the year 1916?

Mr. SISSON. About $140,000,000, immediately before the war broke out.

Mr. KOPP. Go a little further back, say, in 1913 or in 1914.

Mr. SISSON. It was about $100,000,000 annually for four or five years. Perhaps it will average a little less than $100,000,000 annually.

Mr. KOPP. Then we are practically doubling what it was before the war?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; it is more than doubled.

Mr. KOPP. We are not getting back to normal very fast?

Mr. SISSON. I will state frankly that that was my serious objection to signing the conference report, because I did not believe we were getting back to normal as rapidly as we should. The taxpayers should be relieved of this excessive burden.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The pay is increased, and the cost of supplies has increased, and there is the same reflection in the Army as elsewhere from the cost of commodities?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

I did not intend to get into any controversy of any kind. My purpose was solely to explain to my colleagues in the House why I did not sign the conference report. My colleagues on the conference understand it thoroughly. I do not agree with my friend as to his conclusions at all, but this is no time or place to open up that question.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. McARTHUR. Is it not true that this bill also carries the appropriations for rivers and harbors?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; but that is not included in the $226,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, not to find any fault with what the conferees did: The Senate amendment No. 31 is a very complicated and important amendment, and in order that there may be something in the RECORD to indicate to the board of Army officers who will be appointed hereafter to carry out the provisions of this very important amendment, I think it is well and necessary that the chairman of the conferees should make a brief statement of the purposes of this amendment. When it comes to be carried out, the board that is to exercise the functions and powers under this amendment ought to have some idea as to what it means aside from what they might construe it to mean from their own point of view. I think the gentleman ought to make a brief statement as to the purposes of that amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois as to what the purpose was, that under the provisions of the bill we delay the reduction to 12,000 in the number of officers in the Regular Army by providing that the reduction shall be accomplished before the 1st day of January next. We give them six months to work it out. The gentleman is familiar, of course, with the different ways of effecting that reduction. We went into detail in regard to that when the bill was before the House heretofore, and that principle has not been changed, except that in reducing the numbers in the various grades it is accomplished partly by elimination and partly by absorption by delaying promotion. But we arbitrarily reduced the number of those officers who are on what we call the "nonsingle list." For instance, we have arbitrarily reduced the number of medical officers from 1,137, I think it is, to 983.

We reduced the number of dental officers from 236 to 158. We reduced the number of veterinary officers from 161 to 126, the number of officers in the Medical Administrative Corps from 138 to 72, the number of chaplains from 177 to 125. That takes up a total of about 400 officers of the 1,000 that we reduced the Army. This leaves a balance of approximately 600 officers to be removed from what we call the single list of the Army, largely in the line of the Army. As the gentleman knows, the various grades from colonel down to captain have been largely out of balance. The Army has been top-heavy with rank. Promotions have been made on the basis of a total officer force of 17,000, until for an officer force of 12,000 or even 13,000, as we have had, the number of officers in the higher ranks has been out of all proportion to what the Army should have. So we provide on the basis of the proper percentage the number of officers of each grade who shall remain in the service and compose this force of eleven thousand and some hundred officers on the single list.

We give them reasonable time to accomplish that, either by demotion, the principle of which is recognized in the conference report, and by elimination, and also by absorption. We provide for the appointment of five general officers for the board which is to determine the 1,000 officers who are to go out of the Army. We endow them with all the powers necessary to accomplish their work, and we leave it to their discretion and their judgment to determine the number of officers who are to be demoted, and the number who are to absorbed, and I express it as my opinion that these methods will be about equally used.

We also provide that there shall be no promotions made in the Army from the period of the passage of this bill until January 1 next. We have been assured by the Senate that the present number of officers whose names are now before the Senate for promotion, numbering about 150, will not be confirmed. That will leave this number of vacancies in these different officers' grades which we can use for the purpose of making these reductions in the numbers in the various grades, and we intend that this board shall establish some equitable proportion between the forced demotions and the use of this system of absorption in taking up the slack in the Army which we thus create.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. Was it the intention of the conferees that they should be about 50–50?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that that comes as nearly as possible to expressing the idea of your conferees without trying to tie the hands of this board.

Mr. McKENZIE. And the conferees have undertaken to rearrange the grades by elimination and demotion, so that the organizations in the Army will be balanced in all the grades?

Mr. ANTHONY. As nearly as we could provide the percentage which Congress intended in the reorganization act of 1920. But we found in the grade of colonel, for instance, that there were 599 colonels, and when we came up to the question whether there should be demotions in that grade we ran up against a number of instances where the demotion would strike officers who held most distinguished commands during the war, men who had been chiefs of staff of Army corps, who had assisted in some of the essential operations of the Great War. Therefore we have provided for the carrying of a surplus list of colonels in addition to the 421 which would be the proper proportion, to be carried as surplus colonels until absorbed by due process. We have increased the percentage for lieutenant colonels, so that there will be but little surplus to take up there, so that the bulk of demotions will be in the grades of major, captain, and first lieutenant, which, as the gentleman knows, have been swelled entirely out of proportion to what they should be.

Mr. McKENZIE. And the chairman is satisfied that the language of this amendment is so written that there will be no question about the construction of it by the men who are placed on this board to carry it out?

Mr. ANTHONY. We feel that way.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman intend that this general board shall be immediately convened for the purpose of eliminating the various officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is proposed that the work shall be undertaken at once and that they shall be allowed between now and January 1 to complete their work—the sooner the better.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have not had a chance to read the amendment. Has the gentleman provided against the elimination by the board of a large number of colonels, for instance, making necessary the automatic promotion of lieutenant colonels and thus increasing the retired list?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a provision in the bill which prevents all promotion in the Army between now and January next.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. One more question as to the action of the general board: You do not provide for any hearing to be given an officer before he is eliminated from the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. We do not.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. You leave that to the department to determine whether or not it will give the officer a hearing or act upon his record?

Mr. ANTHONY. For the most part the eliminations will have to be purely arbitrary. For instance, take the Medical Corps and the nonsingle list men, and it would be impossible to get that number of inefficient men so that there will be a good many efficient men removed.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. This provision is substantially the same as the bill reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs on which we had hearings.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it is radically different.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is much better.

Mr. HILL. It brings it under the defense act——

Mr. ANTHONY. As nearly as possible to attain it; but the reduction is accomplished much quicker than under the War Department plan, which was by absorption or death or resignation.

Mr. HILL. It still provides for a board of officers to inquire into the fitness.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and Mr. VOIGT called for a division.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion for the previous question.

Mr. VOIGT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VOIGT. Can the gentleman withdraw the motion if I object?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the right to withdraw it. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were 135 ayes and 14 noes.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 175, nays 40, answered "present" 2, not voting 214, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 41: Page 27, line 11, strike out "$4,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,235,043."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,100,940."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to concur in the amendment with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to concur in the amendment with an amendment. In lieu of the sum "$2,235,043" insert "$2,100,940."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the reason why this amendment is brought back to the House is that the amount is lower than the Senate amendment and is not between the amounts in disagreement. Under the rules we are obliged to bring it back to the House for action.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to concur in the amendment with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VOIGT) there were—ayes 160, noes 10.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to concur in the amendment with an amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 213, nays 2, answering "present" 1, not voting 214, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Additional pairs:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.

Mr. Free with Mr. Riordan.

Mr. Morin with Mr. Byrnes of South Carolina.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I voted aye, but I have a general pair with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] and I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. CRAMTON was called and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 30, after line 8, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 65 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by Senate amendment insert the following: "All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That under this provision no amount shall be used for the employment of any additional persons over the number for which the specific appropriation herein provides."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is proposed in order to simplify the bookkeeping for pay of the Army, and the proposed amendment is to prevent the employment of more persons than the amount appropriated in the item will pay for. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 142, noes 12.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum on the vote just had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty Members are present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 216, nays none, answered "present" 1, not voting 214, as follows:

So the motion to recede and concur with an amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.

Mr. Hardy of Colorado with Mr. Sears.

Mr. Mudd with Mr. Collins.

Mr. Classon with Mr. McDuffie.

Mr. Husted with Mr. Collier.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 106: Page 49, line 16, insert after the word "Georgia," Provided, That apartment buildings may be constructed out of this appropriation at a cost not to exceed $150,000 each, and to provide for not less than 18 families each

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. VOIGT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 167, noes none.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

The Speaker proceeded to count.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. VOIGT. For what purpose?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I desire to make a statement, if the gentleman will withhold it. The gentleman's rights will not be prejudiced.

Mr. VOIGT. I have no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that the minority side of the House feels that it has performed very good service for the day?

Mr. MONDELL. Well——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We are not in any way responsible for the points of no quorum being made.

Mr. MONDELL. We realize that, and we have all tried to do our duty. So far as the "gentleman from Wyoming" is concerned, he is perfectly willing to stay in Washington all summer. [Applause.] And as the "gentleman from Wyoming" now feels, he has no disposition whatever to seek to bring about a recess. If gentlemen want to stay all summer long, they can easily accomplish that by leaving here the moment they have answered to their names, so as to make necessary constant roll calls. It will not discommode the "gentleman from Wyoming" a particle for the Congress to remain in session steadily for the next 30 days, and if the gentlemen who are here are not interested enough in having the business closed so that we can take a recess, the "gentleman from Wyoming" is entirely agreeable to that view.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, so far as the minority is concerned, we have done our full duty.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that depends upon what one considers one's full duty. Many of the roll calls to-day will disclose the fact that the minority was not here in very great numbers.

Mr. UPSHAW. Neither was the majority.

Mr. MONDELL. However, I have no disposition to criticize that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The proportion of the minority here throughout the day on every roll call has been greater than the proportion of the majority, and it will be, if the gentleman chooses to go on the rest of the night. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist on his point of order?

Mr. VOIGT. I do.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-five gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as are in favor of the motion will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays none, answered "present" 2, not voting 209, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. Cramton with Mr. Carter.

Mr. Vestal with Mr. Moore of Virginia.

Mr. Wason with Mr. Steagall.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 131: Page 61, after line 14, insert: "Hereafter whenever contracts which are not to be performed within six months are made on behalf of the Government by the Chief of Air Service or by officers of the Air Service authorized to make them, and are in excess of $500 in amount, such contracts shall be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties. In all other cases contracts shall be entered into under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Chief of Air Service."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 198, noes none.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin is too late. The Speaker has just announced that there was a quorum present.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the only time when the point of no quorum could not be given consideration is when the Chair is satisfied in his own mind that a quorum is present. We all know that the fact of calling the roll, particularly when the roll call develops only 220 Members present, as the last did, is not conclusive proof that a quorum is present. The Chair will say that when there is obviously a quorum present the Chair would sustain the point made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. No Member has the right to continue making the point that there is no quorum present when it is probable that a quorum is present. But the Chair thinks he would not be justified in the present instance in deciding that a quorum is present without counting. The Chair will count.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman who made the point of order is not present. He has left the Hall. I suggest that the Sergeant at Arms bring him in.

The SPEAKER. Every Member is his own judge as to whether it is his duty to be present or not.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no person present who made the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, if there is any question about that, I will make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan renews the point of order.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the parliamentary situation is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and sixteen Members—a quorum—are present. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 199, page 109, after line 21, insert:
"All the moneys hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Military Academy shall be disbursed and accounted for as pay of the Military Academy, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that there is a quorum present. The Clerk will report the next one.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I asked for a division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands a division. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The House divided and there were—ayes 210, noes 11.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 214: Page 126, line 2, after the word "surgeons" insert the words "members of the Army Nurse Corps."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 220: Page 130, after the word "Germany," strike out the words "including services of an editor and."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 220 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and amend it to read as follows: Including personal services.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede and concur with the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 221: Page 130, line 6, strike out "$4,800" and insert "$100."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 221 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$16,600."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-night it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that "the ayes have it."

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VOIGT. Is that subject to objection? If it is, I wish to object.

The SPEAKER. No; it is a motion made. The Chair thinks if the gentleman had made a point of order when the gentleman from Wyoming made his motion, that might have been in order.

Mr. VOIGT. I objected after the gentleman made his request.

Mr. MONDELL. I made no request. I made a motion.

The SPEAKER. There has been a vote on it, but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, it was a motion that was carried and not a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. It was a motion, but the Chair wishes to hear the gentleman's objection.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Wyoming made the motion I said almost instantly that I objected, but I did not get my objection into parliamentary form.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is not our fault.

Mr. VOIGT. I made a point of order to that request, and I made it as rapidly as I could.

Mr. MADDEN. It was not a request, it was a motion.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has a Member a right to object to a motion being made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to make a point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. He made no point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Wyoming made his motion, it occurred to the Chair that it was subject to a point of order, and the Chair looked about the House to see if anybody made the point of order, and nobody made it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. VOIGT. I believed that under any fair consideration of what occurred the objection I made should be taken by the Chair to be a point of order.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the motion to fix the hour to meet is not a privileged motion, but such a motion is in order and no point of order can be made against it unless a demand for the regular order is made. The gentleman from Wisconsin never dreamed of making a demand for the regular order. Any motion is in order, whether privileged or not, if nothing else is asked for from the House. A demand for the regular order would have made the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming nonprivileged. But the gentleman from Wisconsin did not ask for the regular order. He did not demand the regular order, and in the absence of such a demand the motion was clearly in order. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Wyoming made the motion the Chair took pains to look and see if there was objection to it, and the Chair certainly looked in the direction of the gentleman from Wisconsin, because it occurred to him that it might possibly come from that direction. [Laughter.] The Chair did not observe any action by the gentleman until after the vote was taken, and then, of course, it was too late.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I think the Reporter's notes will show that I said immediately after the motion was made that I objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that even if that was so it is not sufficient, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair has been very considerate to the gentleman from Wisconsin and answered his parliamentary questions, but a Member of the House who wishes to obstruct must be acquainted with the parliamentary law. [Applause.] The gentleman from Wisconsin, by his own statement, did not come within the rule; he did not demand the regular order. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposal of articles produced by patients in the United States Veterans' Bureau.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3345. An act changing the name of Keokuk Street, in the county of Washington, D. C., to Military Road; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 24, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

6065. Also, resolutions of city council of Pittsburgh, Pa., urging complete canalization of the Ohio River; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

6066. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of Charles Gerard Conn, Esq., Los Angeles, Calif., relative to legislation in behalf of the veterans of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

6067. By Mr. WATSON: Petition from residents of Langhorne, Pa., concerning relief for the Armenians; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 24, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, April 20, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce four bridge bills, which are in the regular form, giving the consent of Congress, and I also shall ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

First, I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11634) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Norman and the town and village of Halstad, in said county, in the State of Minnesota, and the county of Traill and the town of Herberg, in said county, in the State of North Dakota, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North on the boundary line between said States, and I submit a report (No. 785) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Norman and the town and village of Halstad, in said county, in the State of Minnesota, and the county of Traill and the town of Herberg, in said county, in the State of North Dakota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the section line between sections 24 and 25, township 145 north, range 49 west, fifth principal meridian, on the boundary line between Minnesota and North Dakota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POKEGAMA LAKE BRIDGE, MINN.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 10770) to legalize a bridge across the south arm of Pokegama Lake in Itasca County, State of Minnesota, and I submit a report (No. 786) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the highway bridge built by the authorities of Itasca County, Minn., across the south arm of Pokegama Lake, in section 17, township 54, range 25 in said county and State, is hereby legalized and the consent of Congress is hereby given to its maintenance by said county for the use of the general public: Provided, That any changes in said bridge, which the Secretary of War may deem necessary and order in the interest of navigation, shall be promptly made by the said county.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TCHULA LAKE, MISS.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11362) declaring Tchula Lake, Holmes County, Miss., to be a nonnavigable stream, and I submit a report (No. 787) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Tchula Lake, in Holmes County, in the State of Mississippi, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIO GRANDE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11128) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande between the cities of Del Rio, Tex., and Las Vacas, Mexico, and I submit a report (No. 788) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Del Rio and Las Vacas Bridge Co., a copartnership organized and entered into under the laws of the State of Texas, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto over the Rio Grande between the cities of Del Rio, Tex., and Las Vacas, Mexico, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the consent of the proper authorities of the Republic of Mexico shall have been obtained before said bridge shall be built or commenced.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments on a matter of some importance.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate bill 831 be reconsidered. It is possible that one of the amendments adopted by the House may lead to some confusion, and I want to consider it further before final action by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. What bill is it?

Mr. McLEAN. It is the bill which put the State banks on the same plane with the national banks in the matter of single-line credits.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, from the statement made by the Senator yesterday I was impressed with the fact that the amendment of the House to which he refers was a wholesome one, and that no objection could fairly be made to its adoption. Will the Senator allow the amendment to be reported?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not believe the bill is in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. If it is not the Senator will have to accompany his motion with a request to the House to return the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. The reason why I ask for a reconsideration is because I have received a letter from a member of the Federal Reserve Board this morning calling my attention to the fact that one of the amendments may lead to confusion and that by implication it may deprive the State banks of some of the rights which they now have under another section of the statute. He thought it ought to receive further consideration. That is the reason why I make the request.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall make no objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, because I think matters of this character ought to be thoroughly understood by the Senate before they are disposed of. I thought they were understood yesterday, or when the bill was heretofore acted upon. I inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the bill is in the possession of the Senate? If not, I suggest to him that it will be necessary to accompany his motion with a request for its return.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is not in the possession of the Senate, I shall ask that it be recalled from the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the Senator ascertain now; otherwise his motion to reconsider can not be entertained.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, as I understand it, the Senate concurred in the amendments made to the bill by the House, and then the bill stood passed, and it has been enrolled. So it seems to me the only way we can now reach it is to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which it was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am sure that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it will again be before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the Senator's motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut to reconsider will be entered, and the Chair will entertain a motion to request the return of the papers from the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. The papers are not with the House. I believe I was mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Was the bill sent to the House to be enrolled, or was it enrolled here?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand the bill is in the possession of the Senate. I move that the message transmitting the action of the Senate on the bill to the House be recalled.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 308 now on the Vice President's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is on the table.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent to take it from the table and consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the table a resolution which the Secretary will state for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. Senate Resolution 308, calling on all the regional Federal reserve banks except the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta for information regarding the distribution by said banks of a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States by Senator GLASS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, this resolution calls for a list of the names of all the "citizens" to whom Senator GLASS's speech was sent.

Mr. HEFLIN. By the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will confine his request to the expenditure of funds by these banks for the purpose of sending out the speech, I think there will be no objection, because the Government is directly interesed in the profits of these banks. I think his resolution should be directed to the Federal Reserve Board, and if he insists upon securing from the banks their private mailing lists I do not think it is a matter in which the Federal Government is interested. The matter, I will say to the Senator, was considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency yesterday, and it was the unanimous consent of the committee that unless the Senator would modify his request objection to its passage would be made in the Senate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. How can a fiscal agency like the Federal Reserve Board, in circulating a speech like that of Senator GLASS or of any other Senator, have a private mailing list? Why is not the whole thing official and why is it not under the jurisdiction of the Senate and of Congress?

Mr. McLEAN. Whether that is true or not I do not believe the mailing lists of these banks are a matter of interest to the Senate or to the Congress. I do think the expenditures of the banks or the uses of their funds are matters of interest, and that we have a right to inquire whether or not the banks are using their money for the purpose of maintaining a publicity bureau.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me further? W. P. G. Harding as an individual could have a private mailing list and undoubtedly has one. Governor Strong, of the New York bank, as a private individual, could have a private mailing list, and no doubt has one. With those private mailing lists the Congress has nothing to do. But as I understand the resolution of the Senator from Alabama it is directed to the banks. The banks are public institutions under the jurisdiction of Congress and can not possibly have a private mailing list, in my judgment.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not altogether agree with the Senator from Georgia in regard to that. I think his view is subject to modifications,

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut that the speech which has been circulated referred to me. My name was mentioned in it in a number of places. I want to send my speech to the people who received that speech. Am I asking too much of these banks, which at their expense have had that speech printed and circulated, to permit me, a Member of the Senate who made a speech on the other side of the question, to send my speech to them at my own expense? Why does the Senator from Connecticut want to deny me the right to have that list so that I may know to whom that speech was sent and may send my speech, if I desire to do so, to the same people? Why should I be denied that privilege? This is a free country. Why should this list not be given to me?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think it is a matter in which the public have any interest whatever or in which the Senate of the United States has any interest whatever.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator does not think the public is interested in fair play?

Mr. McLEAN. That is another proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. This is a vital question, and we have just begun to fight. The American people are just waking up to it, and they are not going to stand for covering up the situation like the Senator from Connecticut would cover it. These banks did wrong in printing and circulating the speech of one Senator attacking another, and since they had printed and circulated the speech in question they ought to be required to furnish to the Senate the list of names to whom that speech was sent, so that the Senator sought to be injured by the banks in circulating that speech could send to the same people the reply that he made in the Senate to that speech. Is there anything unjust or unfair in that request?

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator will be able to insist upon having fair play. He has adopted the custom of occupying the floor from 5 to 6 o'clock every afternoon of the sessions of the Senate for some time past in giving to the public his views with regard to the Federal Reserve Board and the official conduct of the officers of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Connecticut causes me to consume time by his antagonistic attitude toward this very fair proposition.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no; I plead not guilty to that. I am not responsible for the Senator's speeches, I hope.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know the Senator from Connecticut does not like to hear the speeches which I make, because I am speaking in the interest of the American people.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not care to continue this discussion. I am merely reporting to the Senate the view of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator from Alabama says I do not like his discussion. Frankly, I will say that I think that the Senator's views on banking and financial questions are little short of chaotic.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am satisfied the Senator thinks that. That has been the attitude of certain big financiers ever since we had a banking system.

Mr. McLEAN. I am very well satisfied that if the Senator's views were written into the banking laws of the country no sane banker would remain in the business for a longer period than would be necessary to enable him to get out.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am in favor of sound money, and——

Mr. McLEAN. I object to the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am in favor of a sound banking system honestly administered. I am opposed to a crooked banking system; and it does not make any difference with me what high-browed financiers may think of my position; it does not change it in the least. I know what I am doing; I have got the American people's viewpoint, and I propose to assert it here time and time again. I do not intend that a few men shall corner the money supply of the United States and dole it out as they see fit to a hundred million people. I think the banking institutions were created to serve the business needs of the American people and not for the purpose of making millionaires and billionaires to the detriment and injury of the masses of the people. That, in brief, is my position.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut objects to the passage of my resolution, and I must wait until another time to bring it up in the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

MOB VIOLENCE AT HERRIN, ILL.

Mr. MYERS. Then, Mr. President, I desire to occupy the floor for a short time. I do not consume much of the time of the Senate in debate, but I desire to take a little time this morning on a matter which I think is one of great public importance and grave concern.

Yesterday morning there appeared in the Washington Post some Associated Press dispatches which I think challenged the attention of all thoughtful people and good citizens. I will read some of them. It will not take very long. Here are two Associated Press dispatches, dated June 22. I read them, as follows:

[By the Associated Press.]

CINCINNATI, June 22.—Forty-four persons, two of whom were union coal miners, were killed in the mine disorders at Herrin, Ill., according to the statement to-night of Frank Farrington, president of the Illinois district organization of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. Farrington declared he had received his information from an official of the union at Herrin, but he refused to disclose the identity of his informant.

He also said he had not agreed to permit the mine where the trouble occurred to operate, which it was said would have been possible under the union's general strike policy to permit mining of coal to fuel public utilities.

HERRIN, ILL., June 22 (by the Associated Press).—The death toll in the disaster last night and to-day, when 5,000 striking union miners attacked the Lester strip mine being operated under guard by imported workers, may exceed 40, it was said to-night by those in touch with the situation, although thus far only 27 positively are known to be dead.

In the Herrin hospital are eight wounded men, only one a miner, and six of them are believed to be fatally injured. There were nine, but one died.

A check-up at midnight of casualties in the miners' riot showed the following: Dead, in Herrin morgue, 17; in Marion morgue, 1; in private homes here, 3. Six other bodies seen by the Associated Press representative are believed to be still in the woods.

A miner told the Associated Press correspondent that he had seen 15 bodies thrown into a pond to-day with rocks tied around their necks. About 20 imported miners are missing.

Checking the death list has proved almost impossible. The victims, all but three of them imported workers, so far as is known, were found scattered over an area within several miles of the mine. Some were hanged, some were burned when the mine was fired, others were beaten to death, but the majority fell before the score of bullets poured into them after their surrender.

"Bloody Williamson" County, so called because of several riots, to-night was outwardly calm, but there was a noticeable undercurrent which kept everybody on edge and wondering if further trouble might be expected.

The correspondent talked with scores of miners to-day, and about half of them were certain there would be no further disorder if there was no attempt to reopen the mines, while the other half said they were afraid some of the men might not be held back. Officially, the situation was reported to-night by county officials to be quiet.

It is understood there will be no attempt to reopen the mines until the strike is settled.

The scenes of death to-day were gruesome, as in real war. Bodies with limbs shot away lay along the roadside or were strung from trees; men wounded and dying were stretched out on roads and in fields, with none of the hundreds of passers-by able to lend a helping hand. Attempts to assist the wounded in the early part of the day brought rebuffs from the spectators, backed in some cases by drawn guns.

Later the feeling quieted down and some of the wounded were taken to hospitals.

When the attackers "went over the top" into the besieged mine this morning there were some 50 or 60 workers and guards there. What has become of those not in the list of known dead and wounded can not be said. Some of them were seen to-day in fields running, with miner sympathizers pursuing them with guns. How many escaped could not be told. C. E. McDowell, superintendent of the imported workers, was among the dead. It was said he was the first to be selected to be shot after the mine was captured, and that he was given no opportunity to escape.

Young matrons and girls encouraged their men in the slaying of captive mine employees.

"Let's make soup of them," one of the women suggested, as six men, banded together with a rope, were shot down with one volley.

An examination showed that one of the six still breathed. An executioner with a ready knife completed what the bullets had left unfinished.

One of four men found under a tree in Harrison woods, where the body of a fifth was suspended from a branch, offered a gold watch and $25 to his tormentors when he saw all was over for him.

"You're a good scout," taunted one of his tormentors; "make a run for it."

The fellow was shot down by the man who jeered at him.

A few women ventured to take kodak pictures. The cameras were trampled under foot and the women were roughly handled.

Hundreds of men, women, and little children, some as young as four years, surged through the morgues to-day to view the bodies, which lay on the floor, with no attempt to straighten them out. Most of them bore no identification marks. All were mangled.

Officials of Williamson County to-day expressed deep regret over the affair, as did many miners, but several of the latter told the writer that while it was regrettable, "no other course could have been taken."

Most of the bodies of the mine war victims bore no marks of identification, the empty pockets indicating, county officials said, that the bodies had been looted.

On one body was found an honorable discharge from the Army, while on another was a piece of paper which bore the name of a former infantryman.

In the same edition of the Washington Post appeared another Associated Press dispatch, a part of which I will read. This purports to give an account of this awful affair, as related by one of the parties attacked. I quote as follows:

One miner asked who was the machine-gun operator. Some one pointed him out and he was shot in his tracks and his body laid over the gun. They tied five men with me, took us out on the road, and told us to run. We ran and hundreds of bullets followed us. We staggered on, but finally three of our group fell, pulling the others with us tied down, several bullet holes being in me already.

"I laid there while men came up and fired more shots into me from a distance of three or four feet. Then everything went black. I woke up later and begged for water, but there was not any. I remember being dragged along the road, but I don't know what by. Then they brought us to the hospital."

O'Rourke's story was confirmed by S. P. Williams and Ed. Green, of Chicago, two of the men tied with him. The other three were killed. These were the six found by the Associated Press correspondent this morning and whom he tried to take water to, only to be refused permission to help them.

James E. Morris, of Johnston City, Ill., a young miner in the attacking forces, told the correspondent the attack had been spontaneous, and that when the men went to the mine they did not really stop to think of the blooshed that might follow.

He was wounded early in the fight. "I was on my way to Herrin," he said, "when I met a gang of fellows. They said they were on their way to run out those scabs at the mine. I joined them and others kept joining us until there must have been 5,000.

"Most of us were armed, and those who were not soon got their guns. When we got to the mine we spread out around it. We had no real leaders; everyone was working for himself. It was just one big mob out to get the men who were running the mine. I am not sure who fired the first shot, but after that it was real war. The fire kept up for hours, I guess, and several of our men were hit. Late in the evening I was shot in the arm. The wound was not serious, and I walked back to where a group of our men were standing, and they sent me here in a car. I was not there, but I understand most of the killing was done after the mine surrendered.

"I am sure some of those scabs really were innocent men. It's just the old story of a mob getting started."

Other miners confirmed Morris's statements.

O'Rourke is one of the eight men in the hospital. Morris is the only miner, and seven of the imported workers are expected to die, physicians said.

The hospital was guarded, all doors being locked to prevent any possible attack on the wounded men. Only persons who could prove they had business in the hospital were admitted.

In this morning's Washington Post there appear several Associated Press dispatches relating to the same subject. I will read some of them:

[By the Associated Press.]

HERRIN, ILL., July 23.—Herrin's unhonored dead lay pale and stark to-night in the vacant stone building that has been pressed into service as a morgue since yesterday's battle. Past them filed an unending line of men and women, young and old, barefooted boys and little girls bright in their summer clothes.

They lifted muslin cloths and peered at the pale faces and at the wounds left by pistol bullets, rifle balls, and buckshot. They lingered, then reluctantly pressed on to some adjoining body, eager to miss nothing.

Never a word of pity from the crowd. These were the enemy slain in a labor war. These were the men who came to take away their jobs—outsiders, enemies. "Well, it served them right." That was the attitude of the town, as expressed by its men and women and its children. Tears, none. Sympathy, not much. These were the enemy.

The dead of a half dozen nationalities, with sloping foreheads of the Slav, high profiles of the native born, the long mustaches of eastern Europe, lay at peace for all the crowds, the laughter and the sullen looks. Bricks beneath their heads for pillows, pick boxes for their beds, they lay waiting the call of friends and relatives who loved them once and have lost touch with them in the vicissitudes of transient labor. Most of them, it is safe to say, will be forgotten in the potters' field, their meager courses run, their stories finished.

They came here because they wanted a living and because other men wanted to make money. They died hunted across the fields, stoned, shot at, tied and dragged down dusty county roads because other thousands feared these men would take away their living.

The trees are green in Herrin, and the birds are singing and the crops ripening in the midsummer sun. From the morgue the crowds drift to the billboards in front of the picture show, to see what the posters promise, to the drug store for soft drinks, then home for supper. Only the outsiders show surprise and horror. People here say:

"This is our business. Sorry, but it's done. Let us alone. We will handle this all right. We're good people to get along with—good as anybody, if you mind your own business. We'll attend to ours."

With four of the mine war victims positively identified, cards found on the bodies of nine others may lead to identification.

The positively identified are C. K. McDowell, of Marion, superintendent of the mine; Robert Shoemaker, son of the mayor of Charleston, Ill.; George Henderson and Joe Pitcavitz, of Herrin. The latter two were the only union miners killed. Shoemaker, a holder of two college degrees and formerly a student at three universities, was identified by his father.

As the elder Mr. Shoemaker gazed at his son's body, he said: "His death will kill his mother."

It was the first indication that all of the strikebreakers were not of the "ragged stranger" type.

The massacre of nonunion miners in the woods near the mine where they were employed was the act of a mob which got beyond the control of the cooler element, which was attempting to escort the captives to Herrin, to "show them off to the boys," according to information gleaned to-day.

The leaders, it was said, finally were compelled to yield to the clamors of the mob that the prisoners "beat it." The fleeing men thereupon were shot down, beaten to death, or hanged.

Although a number of the miners shuddered at the slaughter, all say "they got just what they deserved."

As soon as the 44 strip employees surrendered yesterday morning a cry went up for the lives of the captives, persons who were witnesses say. The cooler element, however, advised that the prisoners be marched into town, paraded before the townspeople, and sent out of town.

The cooler element marched just behind the prisoners, who were at the head of the procession, and the disorderly element flocked behind and beside them.

There were cries of "beat it" which grew into a chorus, but the leaders withstood the demand until they arrived at a wooded section about 8 miles from here. There the clamor increased and the mob pressed around the fear-stricken prisoners, some of whom mumbled, evidently in prayer.

Witnesses say the leaders feeling unable longer to resist the crowd's clamor, said to the prisoners:

"Yes; you'd better beat it."

Then followed the massacre.

How many of the prisoners realized that it was to be a fight of death never will be known.

Between the road and the woods on the right side there was a barbed wire fence. Most of the prisoners probably thinking vaguely that it would be something to have the fence between them and the mob, began climbing through the fence. They had difficulty with their suit cases. There were shouts of "Drop your suitcases, you won't need them," which appealed to the humor of the jeering mob. Most of the prisoners dropped their suitcases and scrambled through and hurried into the woods.

The shooting was under way and the killing was on throughout the woods. Men were running and dodging and crowds were following and shooting at them. When one fell, the crowd closed in and fired a volley into the prostrate form. The throats of two were cut.

[By the Associated Press.]

CHICAGO, June 23.—The remnants of Chicago's labor contingent which invaded Williamson County and was repulsed with heavy casualties, straggled back to-day and told stories of merciless bloodshed and horror.

Joseph Sodter, a detective, described brutality and privation he saw during his brief stay in the war-ridden district, and Fred Bernard, cook of the labor gang that went south to begin work in the mines, told a similar tale of persecution and hardship. Bernard said he knew of only four men who lived through the attack on his gang of 52 men.

Sodter, his back full of buckshot and suffering from the effects of hunger and exposure, lay in bed to-day and sold his story.

"We were driving from Carbondale in a truck when we encountered a car about 8 miles from the mine," he said. "I was suspicious. An occupant of the car fired a gun into the air and immediately a hail of bullets came from the shrubbery along the roadside. Two armed guards riding in a car behind us turned their car around and deserted us.

"We speeded up and reached a river where all but Sidney J. Morrison, who was wounded by the firing, jumped in and swam for life. The shot in my back gave me much pain and the wounds were bleeding freely, but I managed to make the other side and hid in the brush. Walking all day, I finally made the camp, where my pals took me in."

Bernard told of the surrender of his gang yesterday morning, how they were herded together and shot in cold blood, and how he escaped by using a fraternal password.

"We were besieged all night, with the boom of dynamite and the crack of the miners' rifles keeping up a continual racket," said Bernard. "In the morning the union miners came across and the white flag went up. I returned to the camp cookhouse to get some papers and when I came out carried a white sheet to show I would give up.

"The first man I saw fired point-blank at me. The bullet grazed my temple. Then they lined us up and marched us into the country about 4 miles. We came to a barbed-wire fence and they ordered us to climb through, warning us that they were going to shoot as we did so. Just as I saw the guns go up I dived into some bushes.

"Lewis Bert, the second cook, was with me. We saw 14 men shot down and 3 hanged. Then they began looking for the rest of us. When they stumbled over us I thought my time had come, but I gave the password of my lodge of Elks and a brother member stepped forward. I showed him my union card and told him I had just come down the day before. Later he took me to his home, gave me something to eat, and paid my fare back to Chicago.

"Bert was almost miraculously spared from death under the withering rifle fire when he crawled to a safe hiding place beneath a clump of blackberry bushes, where he was prostrate three hours."

The second cook was one of the gang of 52, most of whom met their death at the barbed-wire fence.

Two members of a gang which reached the troublesome mine country the first of the week to-day rode into Chicago on the rods, beating their way back from "Little Egypt." They had hidden for hours in the woods before making their escape.

"There were eight of us riding in a truck to the mine last Tuesday morning," said C. J. Mellon, one of the men. "Suddenly, coming around a curve in the road, we were fired upon, and although the driver was wounded he put on speed and we managed to reach a river. We plunged in and swam for life. I reached the woods on the other side and got away."

According to a book signed by all the men who made the trip, recruited through an employment agency here, all knew they were going for "strike duty," officers of the agency declared to-day. F. W. Wilkie, superintendent of the agency, said when he opened the camp on June 12 there was no trouble, but that apparently the citizens of the town resented his coming.

He said his wires were tapped on long-distance calls, his automobile was stopped in the street, and in several instances men sought to pick quarrels with him. The stores in Herrin, he said, refused to sell him meats and other supplies, so that provisions had to be sent from Chicago.

Wilkie laid the cause of the disturbance to moonshine liquor and radical speeches.

"The damage to the mine," he said, "could scarcely be estimated. A $110,000 steam shovel was blown up and supplies valued at $10,000 were confiscated by the raiders."

[By the Associated Press.]

HERRIN, ILL., June 23.—Miners on duty at the closed mines in Williamson County, through an agreement between the coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America, are quitting their posts to-night, with the result that unless substitutes are secured millions of dollars' worth of mines will soon become a total loss through flooding. It is understood that they are quitting because of threats they have received from local miners.

Most of the men quitting are not members of the miners' union, it was said by coal operators and State officials who to-night made a hurried tour of the county to confirm the reports previously received from anonymous sources. They have been caring for the mines since the strike began on April 1. Yesterday and to-day there have been many rumors here that further raids on mines, in retaliation for previous labor troubles, were planned and that the pumpers and guards would be told to leave soon.

And yet we call this free America! This is boasted and vaunted free America, where every American citizen and every alien resident who deports himself according to the law is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness!

What was the offense for which these men were subjected to these frightful outrages, this terrible torture, for which they were beaten to death, shot, killed, murdered, hanged; shot down like dogs after they had surrendered and had run up a white flag—40 or 50 men in a corral, attacked by 5,000 armed men, who, when they were attacked, immediately surrendered, ran up the white flag, and who were then taken out as prisoners and shot down when they were unarmed, defenseless, powerless? What is the offense for which this fearful, inhuman penalty was visited upon them?

Were they guilty of murder, arson, rape, burglary, treason to their country? Had these men outraged little girls, 10 or 12 years old, in their childish innocence, and then beaten in their skulls with clubs and rocks and thrown their dead bodies in thickets along the roadside? Had they outraged some virtuous matron and then cut her throat and left her to welter in her own lifeblood and await the return of her shocked and horrified husband, sons, and daughters? Had they been guilty of burglary? Had they been guilty of murder or of arson? Had they burned down buildings? Had they dynamited railroads or factories? Had they set a town afire? Had they been guilty of larceny? No; none of those things.

Then of what were they guilty? They were guilty, each of them, of exercising the constitutional right of every American citizen of working for a living, of earning an honest living with which to pay his honest debts and defray the living expenses of himself and family. They had labor which was for hire, of which they wanted to dispose. It was their only way of making a living. They had found men who needed their labor, wanted their labor. They had found men who had work to be done and who wanted to hire labor. The labor was peaceful labor. It was lawful labor. It was not bootlegging. It was not dynamiting. It was not contrary to law. There was nothing unlawful about it. The labor was to be performed in a useful and honorable occupation. A wage price was agreed upon. The employers offered a certain wage which they were willing to pay.

The employees were satisfied with the price and with the terms and conditions, and went to work. They needed to make a living. They were poor men. They had to work to make a living. Most of them doubtless had families. They wanted to do an honest day's work for an honest day's wages. They wanted to perform honest labor, and in return receive honest money, honestly earned, in order that they might take that money and pay the living expenses of themselves and their families, rent houses, buy clothing and food, and obtain medical attendance, if necessary. They wanted to pay for these things. They did not want to be deadbeats or bums. They did not want to beg or steal. They wanted to earn their living, and earn the money with which to pay their honest debts, and pay for the necessities of life. They thought they were guaranteed that right by the Constitution of the United States and by the constitution of the State in which they were employed. They thought they would be protected by the Government, some of them being citizens of this Government, and others peaceful denizens and residents, and entitled to its protection. That is the offense for which this terrible crime was committed, horrible beyond description.

During the progress of the World War, and after the cessation of hostilities, I have stood on this floor and condemned German atrocities perpetrated upon the captive troops and upon the people, men and women, of the Entente Allies during the World War. Others of this country, some far abler men than I, have in severest terms condemned German atrocities of the World War. German atrocities of the World War horrified this country from one end to the other; but I doubt if any German atrocities were perpetrated during the World War that were more horrible, more shocking, more inexcusable, than the atrocities of which I have just read; and yet we call this free America, a land of liberty, a constitutional Government!

There is no free America, and there never will be any free America until an American citizen or an American resident who wants to work and earn an honest living can seek and obtain honest work and perform that work in peace, without getting the consent of an invisible government, a self-constituted superior power, superior to human rights, superior to the Government.

There can be no free America until an American citizen or denizen can work at his calling or trade without having first to get the consent of an organized minority, a power which is more tyrannical and more domineering than anything else that has ever exercised tyranny and dominating power in this country; without having to get the consent to work of anybody or any organization other than himself and his employer. That is what free America should mean.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator passes from the relation of facts, where did these men who were attacked come from? Were they people who lived in that vicinity?

Mr. MYERS. Not at all; I think most of them came from an employment agency in Chicago.

Mr. BORAH. In order that we may have full information which will enable us to understand the condition there, which must be dealt with not only from the standpoint of punishing those who attack people who want to labor but from the standpoint of curing the evil which brought on this condition, does not the Senator think we ought to know whether those men went there in good faith or whether they went there merely at the suggestion of detectives as strike breakers?

Mr. MYERS. I assume that they went there in good faith. That is a presumption which should be indulged in toward every man under the law. The law presumes that every man acts in good faith. If those men went there for peaceful purposes, for lawful purposes, and were unarmed; if they went there to make a living, I can see no evidence of bad faith in their going there. A man has a right to earn a living in this country. He has a right to go wherever he can find work. Two of those men were ex-service men. Two of them were college graduates. One of them was the son of the mayor of an American city. They were not all imported from Chicago. Some of them, it appears, lived in that part of the State.

Mr. BORAH. I do not disagree with the Senator at all in his assertion that men should be protected and should be guarded in their rights. If those men went there to work, they ought to have been protected, and even if they went there at the suggestion of detectives as strike breakers, they should have been protected against unlawful assaults; but the men who brought them in there—the operators—must have known from experiences of the past that that kind of thing inevitably brings on just such affairs as happened at this place. I quite agree that men have a right to work, and are entitled to the protection of the law, but I am also a believer in the proposition that these conditions can only be avoided by curing the evils which bring on such awful crimes.

Mr. MYERS. I say that the striking miners had an undoubted constitutional right to quit work. Every American citizen has a right to quit work whenever he sees fit, and his employer has an equal constitutional right to hire other men to take the places of those who quit whenever they see fit, and other men have an equal constitutional right to go there and take those places and perform that work, and they ought to be protected by the Government in doing so. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has stepped out of the Chamber, but I do not believe he will dispute any of those assertions.

I can see nothing unlawful in any of the proceedings which gave these men work. I can see nothing unconstitutional in them. I can see nothing contrary to the privileges of an American citizen. It is the right of union coal miners in this country to quite work if they wish. On the other hand, it is the right, yea, not only the right but the duty, of the owners of the coal mines, if they can do so, to get other men to take the places of those quitting, and to keep the mines running, if they can get men with whom they can agree as to terms and conditions of labor and wages.

It is the duty of the mine owners, if they can do so, to keep the mines running with other employees, because coal is a public necessity, and the mine owners owe a duty to the public to supply the public with a public necessity in order to keep the public from freezing and starving to death; and the mere fact that some of these men came from Chicago does not alter the situation one iota, in my opinion, and not all of them were from Chicago, for it seems that some of them came from that community, or from close by. Men from Chicago have just as much right to the constitutional protection of this Government as men in any other part of the United States. Chicago is in the United States. It is not beyond the pale of protection. I make no distinction as to localities or places or men. All have a right to the protection of their Government, and people in Chicago have just as much right to go to southern Illinois and obtain peaceful, lawful employment as have people in that vicinity, or anywhere else, to work.

I assert that the employers were within their rights and were performing their duty to the public, and that the men who went there to work were within their rights as American citizens, or, if not all citizens, as residents of the United States and of the State of Illinois. These men were cruelly killed, brutally murdered, for exercising their simple rights as citizens or residents. Is there any free America about that? No.

So I say there is no free America, and there never will be any so long as an American citizen does not have the free and untrammeled right to work when and where and for whom and upon such terms and at such wages as he may please, without asking leave of any invisible power, any self-constituted superior power, any organized minority, or any organization.

That condition, however, strange as it may seem, does not exist in the United States to-day. To-day an honest workman who does not belong to a labor union is not altogether at liberty to go and hunt work and obtain peaceful, lawful employment at an honest occupation and earn an honest living without getting the consent of somebody else other than himself and his employer. He has to get the consent of a self-constituted superior power, of an invisible government, of an organized minority, which has decreed that no man in the United States has an inherent right to work unharmed at a peaceful occupation without "our consent." That is the condition in the United States to-day to a large extent, at least in many parts of the country, and so long as that condition exists we have no right to boast of vaunted "free America," the "land of liberty," because the freedom is not here. Liberty is not here. To whom are freedom and liberty denied? To the humble workingman, perhaps the most humble, not the most unimportant, because he is one of the most important citizens of our country, but to one of the most humble and unpretentious citizens of our country, the plain workingman. To many thousands, hundreds of thousands of our humblest but most deserving citizens the inestimable right to work when and where and for whom they please, without the consent or approval of anybody else, is denied. So long as that may be the case this will not be free America, the "land of liberty." When such awful things as the horrible crime of which I have been talking can happen it is not free America. These men who were so brutally killed did not enjoy the benefits of free America. They were deprived of their lives, when pursuing their rights, by lawless acts that defy free America and make a farce of it.

Those lawless acts were the result of the dominance of an organized minority, and I say that the domination of an organized minority is the greatest menace that confronts the American people to-day. Those acts were the result of the power of an organized minority, and that organized minority, through higher officials of the organized minority, and in peaceful and more gentle but none the less effective ways, can come to Congress and get nearly anything it wants, from my observation, by peacefully and silently, but nevertheless quite effectively, swinging a club over the head of Congress or shaking a mailed fist in its face. In my opinion, legislation at the behest of organized minorities is seriously threatening the life and stability of this Government. I do not confine that remark to the organized minority of which I started out to speak. I refer to all organized minorities, of which there are many. I have heard it asserted by people who have made a study of the subject that 70 per cent of American legislation enacted by Congress or by State legislatures is enacted at the behest of organized minorities, and I do not doubt it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator believe in the initiative and referendum?

Mr. MYERS. I do not believe in them at all in national affairs and I have very little faith in them in State affairs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If 70 per cent of our legislation is the result of the propaganda of a minority, is not one of the remedies a direct vote upon legislation by the people?

Mr. MYERS. No; because you can not well have the referendum without the initiative, and when you grant the initiative it places even more power in the hands of an organized minority. It is "more power to you, more strength to your arm."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Can the Senator suggest a remedy for a condition which exists in this country such as he has described, where 70 per cent of the laws made are only enacted at the request and by the influence of minorities?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the remedy?

Mr. MYERS. Backbone in public men. That is the only effective remedy of which I know. I do not think there is much of it in public life to-day, but I hope there may be more in future. I believe that legislation enacted at the behest of organized minorities is a grave menace to this country to-day. It is seriously threatening the life and stability of this Government, and unless it is stopped no man can tell the end or foresee the result, except that I believe it will be disaster of the gravest kind; and unless outrages of the kind to which I have referred this morning are stopped by an aroused public sentiment, as reflected in halls of legislation, the country will go all the more speedily to inevitable disaster. Both legislative and executive officials should take sharp notice of the dangers that beset us.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, does not the Senator believe that the fault for permitting such a horrible catastrophe was rather in a deficiency in the police control by the constituted authorities of the State in preserving the peace, rather than due to any legislation or to any influence exercised by any so-called organized minority?

Mr. MYERS. Undoubtedly there is much in that suggestion.

Mr. BURSUM. If all of the men who attacked the miners had been deprived of arms and ammunition and peace had been kept there, and if the operators had also been deprived of the power of employing armed guards and the State had functioned in preserving the peace, that would have solved this matter and prevented this catastrophe. It is a very simple proposition. It is a matter of maintaining peace.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the evidence shows that the guards were armed for any purpose except defense, and they did not seem to make very much defense in this case.

Mr. BURSUM. Does not the Senator think it is within the province of, and that it is the duty of, the constituted government, whether it be a city or a State, to furnish protection?

Mr. MYERS. I do.

Mr. BURSUM. And that no man or organization or employee, either organized or otherwise, or employer, organized or otherwise, should be permitted to have anything to do with taking the law into their own hands?

Mr. MYERS. I believe that. It is the primary duty of the Government, but if the Government does not do it, people have a right to arm to defend themselves against lawlessness.

Mr. BURSUM. It is the fault of the State of Illinois in not doing its duty.

Mr. MYERS. Undoubtedly there was grave dereliction in the executive branch of the State government of Illinois.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator means the State authorities?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; the State authorities. I said the executive department of the government of Illinois, the State officials. Undoubtedly they were derelict. They will be derelict further, in my opinion. In my opinion, nothing will be done about this matter. I do not expect any punishment of the guilty. I predict that there will be no punishment of any of the perpetrators of this crime. There will doubtless be a grand jury called, but on that grand jury there will doubtless be business men whose business is likely to be disastrously affected if indictments are returned. Their business is liable to be boycotted; and the State's attorney and the sheriff have to be elected in that community and the people who perpetrated this crime evidently, owing to their numbers, constitute quite a considerable proportion of the voters of that community. I do not think anything whatever is likely to come from it in the way of punishment. It will be passed over, in my opinion, and will only tend to encourage and incite others to like crimes, in other instances, when they may feel they have like provocation.

I have seen some statements in the newspapers with reference to possible intervention by the Federal Government with a view to settling the coal strike. I think that would be unwise. I think the executive officers of the various States should do their duty and prevent lawlessness, or punish it after it is committed, and I think this strike should be allowed to run its course, according to natural results. If the Federal Government interferes, it is sure to result in only a patched-up peace, and, in my opinion, a further outbreak a little later would result. In the fall of 1919 the Federal Government interfered and settled a coal strike, and I think it only encouraged the strikers to bide their time and renew their striking activities. It did not afford any effectual settlement of the matter.

If this strike were allowed to run its natural course, and if the people who want to work and earn an honest living were permitted to work in the mines and supply the people with coal, and if the Government would protect them in exercising that right, I believe the strike would work itself out to a wholesome, healthful, and natural settlement that would effectively prevent a renewal of it for a good many years to come. But in order to do that and to uphold the dignity of the law and the rights of the parties concerned, there must be backbone and effective action in all branches of both the Federal and the State Governments. When mine owners and miners may learn that they must settle their own differences, and that the Government will do nothing more than preserve order and uphold the law and prevent or punish crime, but that it will certainly do that, there will be fewer miners' strikes, and those that occur will be sooner ended.

SOLDIERS' BONUS—GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the RECORD in 8-point type a letter which General Washington, on June 18, 1783, addressed to the governors of the thirteen States from his headquarters at Newburgh. I am indebted to the Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, a Member of the other House, for this letter. It bears upon the soldiers' bonus, and seems fully to sustain the position which I took in reference to General Washington's attitude in the matter from the very beginning. I think it will be of value and interest to the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extracts from Washington's letter of congratulation and advice to the governors of the thirteen States, headquarters, Newburgh, June 18, 1783.]

"* * * In this state of absolute freedom and perfect security, who will grudge to yield a very little of his property to support the common interests of society and insure the protection of government? Who does not remember the frequent declarations at the commencement of the war, that we should be completely satisfied if, at the expense of one-half, we could defend the remainder of our possessions?

"Where is the man to be found who wishes to remain indebted for the defense of his own person and property at the exertions, the bravery, and the blood of others, without making one generous effort to pay the debt of honor and gratitude? In what part of the continent shall we find any man, or body of men, who would not blush to stand up and propose measures purposely calculated to rob the soldier of his stipend and the public creditor of his due? And were it possible that such a flagrant instance of injustice could ever happen, would it not excite the general indignation and tend to bring down upon the authors of such measures the aggravated vengeance of heaven?

"* * * For my own part, conscious of having acted while a servant of the public in the manner I conceived best suited to promote the real interest of my country; having, in consequence of my fixed belief, in some measure, pledged myself to the Army, that their country would finally do them complete and ample justice, and not willing to conceal any instance of my official conduct from the eyes of the world, I have thought proper to transmit to your excellency the inclosed collection of papers relative to the half pay and commutation granted by Congress to the officers of the Army; from these communications my decided sentiment will be clearly comprehended, together with the conclusive reasons which induced me at an early period to recommend the adoption of this measure in the most earnest and serious manner. As the proceedings of Congress, the Army, and myself are open to all, and contain, in my opinion, sufficient information to remove the prejudice and errors which may have been entertained by any, I think it unnecessary to say anything more than just to observe that the resolutions of Congress now alluded to are undoubtedly and absolutely binding upon the United States as the most solemn acts of confederation or legislation.

"As to the idea which, I am informed, has in some instances prevailed that the half pay and commutation are to be regarded merely in the odious light of a pension, it ought to be exploded forever; that provision should be reviewed, as it really was, a reasonable compensation offered by Congress at a time they had nothing else to give to officers of the Army for services then to be performed; it was the only means to prevent a total dereliction of the service; it was part of their hire. I may be allowed to say it was the price of their blood and of your independency; it is therefore more than a common debt; it is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a pension or gratuity nor canceled until it is fairly discharged.

"With regard to the distinction between officers and soldiers, it is sufficient that the uniform experience of every nation of the world combined with our own proves the utility and propriety of the discrimination. Rewards in proportion to the aid the public draws from them are unquestionably due to all its servants. In some lines the soldiers have perhaps generally had as ample compensation for their services by the large bounties which have been paid to them as their officers will receive in the proposed commutation; in others, if besides the donation of land, the payment of arrearages of clothing and wages (in which article all the component parts of the Army must be put upon the same footing) we take into the estimate the bounties many of the soldiers have received and the gratuity of one year's full pay, which is promised to all, possibly their situation (every circumstance being duly considered) will not be deemed less eligible than that of the officers. Should a further reward, however, be judged equitable, I will venture to assert no man will enjoy greater satisfaction than myself in an exemption from taxes for a limited time (which has been petitioned for in some instances) or any other adequate immunity or compensation granted to the brave defenders of their country's cause, but neither the adoption or rejection of this proposition will in any manner affect, much less militate, against the act of Congress by which they have offered five years' full pay in lieu of the half pay for life which had been before promised to the officers of the Army."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12090) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXPENSES OF DISTRICT RENT COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 220).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate, District of Columbia, fiscal year 1923, for salaries and expenses for the Rent Commission, in amount $72,500, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATE, TREASURY DEPARTMENT, 1921 (S. DOC. NO. 217).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation, Treasury Department, fiscal year 1921, for contingent expenses, office of Director of the Mint, $15.88, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATE, NAVY DEPARTMENT, 1922 (S. DOC. NO. 218).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation, Navy Department, fiscal year 1922, for reimbursement to the Pittsburgh-Des Moines Steel Co., $2,167.24, and for property compensation for the naval air station site at Cape May, N. J., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF COURT OF CLAIMS JUDGMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 221).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, in total amount $20,699.47, requiring an appropriation for their payment—under the War Department, $1,644.57; under the Post Office Department, $16,502.06; and under the Department of Justice, $2,552.84—which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE (S. DOC. NO. 219).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of claims amounting to $229,624.19, allowed by the General Accounting Office under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or by operation of law carried to the surplus fund of the Treasury—Department of State, $230.46; Treasury Department, $462.89; independent offices, $15.50; War Department, $46,652.72; Navy Department, $10,299.03; Interior Department, $29.15; Department of Commerce, $0.54; Department of Labor, $17.01; Department of Justice, $5; and Post Office Department, $171,911.89—which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10025) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war (Rept. No. 789); and

A bill (H. R. 10643) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors (Rept. No. 790).

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2580) for the relief of Michael Sweeney, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 791) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 3742) for the relief of John H. Fesenmeyer, alias John Wills; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 3743) granting a pension to Edith F. Morrill (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3744) for the relief of Harry E. Fiske; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 3745) for the creation of the Columbia Basin irrigation commission, and authorizing an appropriation therefor; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. KING (by request):

A bill (S. 3746) for the promotion of commerce, the provision of revenue, and the reduction of the public debt; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

TARIFF BILL AMENDMENT.

Mr. KENDRICK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7456, the tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment providing that the $150,000 appropriated by section 2 of the act of February 14, 1920, for completing the construction of a dam with bridge superstructure and the necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River for the irrigation of Indian lands on the Gila River Indian Reservation, Ariz., be reappropriated for such purposes, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12090, the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING SITE AT PARIS, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11298) amending existing law which authorizes the construction of a public building at Paris, Tex., so as to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a new site for same by exchanging therefor land and property now owned by the United States Government in said city; and to authorize the erection on said new site, when acquired, of a public building suitable for post-office purposes; and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12090) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall occupy but briefly the time of the Senate, but it shall be devoted to discussion of the bill before us. You, sir, the Members of this body, and the country are weary of the interminable debate on the pending measure which has dragged its weary length through the days and nights of the past more than eight weeks. A few Democratic Senators have occupied the time of the Senate for an aggregate of many days in discussing a few of the various items of the bill; insignificant items which could not affect the people have received more attention than those of greater consequence. The same argument has been repeated over and over again, and when some item after prolonged debate has been adopted by a record vote, the next one involving the same principle has been the subject of the same debate by the same Senators. Everyone must have noticed that two or three Senators are apparently operating in relays, and when one gets tired another relieves him. And yet we are told there is no filibuster on.

Why, sir, we are informed that these oft-repeated speeches are necessary in order that the people may know just what this bill proposes to do; and then will follow the real reason for this desire to carry information to the people, namely, that it will turn Republicans from power. The object that these Senators have in mind is political. Is it not strange that Senators who are more interested in party success than in passing a good revenue bill should try to delay the enactment of a law which they insist will destroy the Republican Party? Mr. President, what these Senators fear most is the passage of the bill a sufficient time before election to get a practical test of just what effect it will have upon the general prosperity of the country. They doubt the tested logic of their own argument, and under the existing rules of the Senate they can, and probably will, prevent action on the measure until late in the summer or fall.

Mr. President, the history of the debate on the pending bill shows how wise it would have been for the Senate to have amended its rules as I proposed at the last session of this Congress. But failing to do that, how well it would have been if the amendment had been taken up at the beginning of this session and then held here night and day to the exclusion of all other business until the rules had been changed. If this had been done, our work now would have been practically completed. Congress could adjourn and the country could be given a rest from the petty debate which prolongs the enactment of legislation and holds the business of the country in suspense. Sir, I am in favor of proceeding to the business of amending the rules now, even if such action should postpone the tariff and other measures indefinitely. The country has the right to expect that the majority will legislate. It is better that the majority shall make mistakes at times, for which the electorate will hold them responsible, than that matters of legislation shall be delayed until a unanimous-consent agreement to vote can be reached. I realize that legislation is usually a compromise between contending advocates, and many times such compromises are wise; but sometimes, as in this case, the opposition is not for the purpose of making the legislation better, but with the desire to make it appear obnoxious and for political purposes.

Let me say to the members of the Finance Committee, who have worked so long and hard and patiently upon this bill, that unless the Senate amends its rules we will get a vote when the minority consents that it may be taken, and that will be at a time when they think that they will be able to get the greatest political advantage from its passage, or at least when they think they will be least injured by its passage.

I hope the time will come when the tariff will not be the football for party politics. Several years ago I endeavored to convince the Congress that a congressional declaration of tariff principles should be made, and then a strong nonpartisan commission should be created to carry out that declaration. I did not succeed, but some time that or a similar plan will be adopted by law. It is my firm belief that a great majority of the people believe in a tariff for protection. The records will show that some of the loudest and most persistent opponents of the bill evidently believe that protection is a local issue, for they have voted for protection even higher than the rates proposed by the Finance Committee on products of their States; and the old distinction between the tariff for revenue only with incidental protection and a tariff for protection with revenue incidental does not exist in the minds of other than theorists. Practically all now believe in protection for their own industries, and at this time especially all realize that the Government must have $4,000,000,000 annually to meet its expense necessities even under the economical administration in practice.

Common decency and fairness would seem to dictate to Democratic Senators a course of helpfulness instead of obstruction at this time. The great national depression from which our country has suffered, but from which it is slowly emerging, was a legacy from the last administration. The almost overwhelming burdens of financial obligations which the present administration must meet and carry were inherited from its Democratic predecessor. This bill has two objects in view, namely, to restore industry to a normal condition and to raise revenue to help meet the financial needs of the Government. I do not recall a single helpful suggestion that the opposition has made.

The Republican Party took over the Government in March, 1921. General depression as a result of the war and of Democratic incompetency existed everywhere. Bankruptcy knocked at the doors of thousands of our factories. The products of the farm did not bring on the market the cost of producing them; labor was out of employment; railroad credit was destroyed; the banks were sitting in the shadow of fear; industrial and financial paralysis threatened the life of the Nation. With these conditions existing, the new administration was called upon to meet obligations which it did not contract but for which it had to provide. Why, sir, the annual interest charge on the war debt is greater than the entire annual cost of the Government prior to the war. An effort has been made, not altogether without success, to levy taxes so as not to discourage the restoration of industry. This bill will raise directly and indirectly something over $350,000,000. Those duties which are levied upon noncompeting articles are duties which will undoubtedly be paid by the consumer. These are what may properly be termed "Democratic duties"—for revenue only. The protective duties may not be—they usually are not—paid by the consumer, but are paid by the foreign exporter as a contribution out of his profits for the benefit of the Government whose markets he is permitted to enjoy but for the support of which he pays nothing. And this reminds me of the one great fact that must not be overlooked, but which ought to be conclusive of this matter to every patriotic American, and that is that all, or practically all, of the arguments against a protective tariff and especially against this bill are furnished by the importers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say that the pending tariff bill will yield about $350,000,000 in revenue.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the estimate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator aware that the existing law will yield that much for the current fiscal year?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not looked into that matter. It is immaterial to my argument.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator ought to investigate that before he condemns the existing law. As a matter of fact, no tariff bill ever passed heretofore has yielded what the existing law will yield for the fiscal year ending with the 30th day of this month. I have said, and I repeat, that the pending bill will not put increased revenues into the Treasury of the United States, because even its champions, of whom the Senator is one, do not claim that it will yield any more than the existing law yields.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator sure of that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can give the Senator the figures approximately. For instance, I have here an item which was published in the Washington Post, which, at least, can not be charged with being prejudiced.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the Senator will not read it in my time. If he wants to ask a question, I am glad to have him do so, but I ask him not to read any article in my time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator does not object, I would like to give him the figures. I only quote the Post, an authority which the Senator should accept.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is gratuitous.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Post says:

In that year—

That is, the last year of the Payne-Aldrich law—

the customs receipts were $332,000,000, while on June 19—

That is, of the present month—

they have reached $341,000,000, with still 10 days to go.

So that the receipts of the current fiscal year from the existing Underwood-Simmons law will reach the very figure which the Senator estimates for the proposed bill, which proves that the proposed bill is not to raise revenue. It is merely to shut out imports and put articles on the taxable list which are now free.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It proves absolutely nothing of the kind. In the first place, I mentioned the fact incidentally that a tariff must raise revenue. We have to get revenue and we ought to get as much as we can out of the tariff. A protective tariff regards revenue as incidental to protection. The existing law is denied by its supporters to be protective. Furthermore, the Senator knows, and if he desires to be fair will admit, that because of the prospect of the passage of the bill which is now being considered, and which proposes certain increases in tariff duties, the importers are bringing foreign goods into this country just as rapidly as they can.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken there. If the Senator will permit me, our exports and our imports this year are both less than they were last year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the imports would have been still less had it not been for the fact that we are proposing to pass a protective tariff law. That is the history of changes of this kind in our fiscal policy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator certainly does not mean that the imports are booming, because they are not. They are not what they were last year. So there again he is entirely mistaken in his facts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand, of course, that no business is booming to any great extent, and has not been booming since the depression began. Nineteen hundred and twenty was a good year; there is not any doubt about that. Since then both imports and exports have decreased; that can not be doubted; but nevertheless the principle which I have stated is true, and it works the world over, as everybody knows. Imports are greatly on the increase now, as the record will show, and largely because of the probability that some time the bill now pending, which increases duties, will become a law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield to the Senator if he desires to ask me a question, but not for him to make an argument in my time. I have become sick and tired of the custom which Senators have of taking the floor to make a speech and then yielding to some other Senator to make a speech in their time.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator had desired to be courteous, he would have waited to see if I was going to make a speech or to ask a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no desire to be anything else but courteous, and I gladly yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator if he really meant to say a little while ago that it was the history of tariff legislation that there was a slackening of imports while tariff measures were being considered?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No. What I said was that when Congress is considering a tariff measure which proposes to raise the rates of duty over those contained in existing law it is the disposition and practice of importers to bring into this country all the commodities they can before the increased tariff rates take effect.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to say just the reverse of that, and I thought the Senator could not possibly have meant that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am glad the Senator called my attention to the misunderstanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me further, I should like to say that always when a tariff bill which increases the rates of existing law is being considered imports are greatly increased as a result.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I said; and what we are proposing to do now is to increase certain rates.

Mr. SIMMONS. But there has been no great influx of imports since we began to consider the pending bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator has made clear the point which I made, and which I had supposed was understood.

Mr. President, if some of the Senators who are combating duties on imports were the attorneys for these gentlemen they could not work harder or more zealously than they are working now. Think, for instance, of the effort of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] in resisting the duty on knives for practically one whole day. The evidence was that these importers bring in knives made abroad at a landed cost in the United States of less than $2 a dozen and then sell them either at the same price or a trifle below the selling price of American-made knives, making thereby from 200 to 600 per cent profit. And yet the Senator objects to these importers paying a reasonable per cent of these profits for the support of the Government under which they are permitted to do business. Such a duty would not add a cent to the consumer's cost, but might add a large amount to the revenue of the Government.

There are hundreds of similar items in this bill.

Mr. President, I am in favor of giving American capital and American labor at least an equal opportunity in the American market with their competitors from abroad. Indeed, I would give our own a shade the better of it. I am opposed to bringing American labor to the level of foreign labor.

I repeat that the records disclose that the great mass of evidence submitted to the committees of the House and Senate on this bill was given by importers, and this evidence is the material which is used by the opposition on the floor of the Senate.

If the tariff is a tax added to the cost to the consumer, why should the importer complain? All that would be necessary for him to do would be to mark up his price and the consumer would pay it. But he knows—no one better—that the tariff would come out of his profits unless it is prohibitive, and to such a tariff I am opposed.

This bill is not pleasing to me in every particular. I doubt if I could draw up a bill that would satisfy even myself. I have never known a bill to be drawn up by any party that was satisfactory in every particular to any Member of either party. Every tariff bill comprehends thousands of items, and full and complete information in detail can not be obtained as to every one of them. I understand some of the difficulties surrounding the framing of tariff bills, and I repeat if the duty were assigned to me individually to draw up a tariff bill, with the assurance that it would pass, I could not do it; I would not be qualified to do it, and I doubt if any other Senator would be qualified. Some of the items in the measure I feel sure are too high, and I am voting against them. I can not be sure as to all. I have neither the time nor the ability to study and pass upon them in detail. I have read the bill and I have listened as much as my time and patience would permit to the arguments which are presented for and against, and where I am in doubt I have no hesitation in deciding in favor of the American argument as against the importer's argument presented through a filibuster.

I would like to sit in this Chamber and listen to honest debate on both sides and have the time of the Senate devoted to that purpose. Then I would pay great respect to those who hold opposite views from mine, because I have an open mind all the time; but no information can be obtained from much of the debate that has been going on in the Senate now for more than eight weeks.

I recognize the fact that this is about the most unfavorable time imaginable to revise the tariff. Not only are all world industrial conditions abnormal, all values changing almost daily, exchanges fluctuating with the rising and setting of the sun, reconstruction going on in nearly every country in the world, but since the House passed this bill the total changes in all conditions which affect values have made it almost impossible to use the House bill except as a glossary of titles, and at the rate the Senate is moving this pending measure will become ancient by the time it is allowed to pass. Under the circumstances the provision of the bill authorizing the President to adjust rates is of greatest value. That conditions will continue to change there can be no doubt. I am equally convinced that pre-war conditions will not be exactly restored. An ideally perfect tariff law to-day might not fit the situation next year.

We know, however, that these conditions are not the same in the different countries. We also know, as I have already stated, that practically all of our great competitors have placed duties upon our products shipped to their markets; we also know that every man or woman in this country who engages in labor or business has the hope of some day becoming the employer of labor or the owner of an enlarged business. I contend, sir, that every honest, intelligent, industrious, and wisely economical man in America has a right to expect to succeed. All of our great successful men have passed through all the stages from laborer to proprietor, while in most other countries there is a labor class and an employer class, with no hope of passing from the former to the latter. I want to maintain the American condition in so far as lies within my power, and I want to remove every obstacle from the path which the employee must travel to the position of employer.

I do not believe that pre-war wages for labor will ever obtain again, nor do I believe that the so-called cost of living will reach its former low level; and by cost I mean consumption prices. If my philosophy is correct it is not necessary that wages and prices should be reduced to the prior level. It is the unearned wage, the extortionate price, against which I in-veigh. The profiteer is the real enemy of his country and countrymen. In this country every honest, industrious man has the right to earn and receive more than enough simply to eke out a bare existence for himself and family; but no man has a right to demand and receive wages or prices for which he does not render a reasonable equivalent.

The farmer who complies with conditions of success is entitled to succeed and the price for his product should be compensatory. The manufacturer who employs labor and whose factory furnished a market for farm products should be able to pay reasonable wages and prices, and then he is entitled to a reasonable return upon his investment of mind and energy and other capital. All of these are corelated and subject to such emergencies as drought and storm and war—and now and then a demoralizing Democratic administration. I am now speaking of the general principle or rule. The American policy of protection is conducive to good and stable prices and wages. It conserves the one great market in the world for both capital and labor. Its legitimate result is good prices for both labor and products. Every rightly constituted American citizen expects to earn and receive more than he pays out. He is therefore more interested in receiving a good price for what he sells, whether it be for his labor or the products of his farm or factory, than in what he pays for the things he buys. I can see no economic advantage to anyone from low prices except it be to the retired capitalist or other idler, in whose welfare I am not interested. I want to legislate where legislation is needed and is practicable for the men and women who do things beneficial to the world.

It might be well for the man who only buys, never sells, to encourage the importation into the United States of cheaper-made foreign products, but it certainly would not be well for the American who has something to sell and upon the sale of which his ability to support himself and family depends.

Mr. President, I have no sympathy with these arguments in the interest of importers. Neither have I patience with these people who insist upon protection for what they and their States sell, but demand that they may go into the foreign market where they can purchase without duty the more cheaply made goods which they buy.

I insist that it is a self-evident proposition that the United States should produce, if economically practicable, the things necessary for its existence and the general welfare in time of peace or war, and this is true notwithstanding the fact that these products might be secured at a less price at the time being from a foreign country than they could be produced in the United States. Sugar and other necessary foodstuffs, nitrates, potash, and fuels are examples in point and are as essential to the life and welfare of the Nation as are naval and military protection.

This proposition is the basis of the Republican doctrine of a protective tariff. Under it the United States has become the most wealthy, the most progressive, and the most independent Nation in the world. The policy of establishing and maintaining American industry has not resulted in increasing the tax or consumption-cost burdens to the people; certainly not out of proportion to their increased ability to pay caused by this policy. It is an indisputable fact that when the importer has control of the domestic market prices have been higher to the consumer than when the American has been given a proper competitive duty which has induced him to enter into production here.

I have heard the opposition frequently refer to the tariff as the "mother of trusts." This is the Democratic stock argument always in order. There can be produced no facts to prove this statement. Quite as many trusts or approximate monopolies exist where absolute free trade in their products exist as in cases of protected industries. This fact, however, must be admitted, namely: The United States can control combinations in restraint of fair trade and competition existing here, but it can not control trusts and combinations in other countries, in some of which they are actually encouraged by their Governments to combine. The National Cash Register Co. sought to destroy its competitors in the United States, and the Federal statutes were invoked successfully to restrain it. This, however, did not prevent it from building factories in foreign countries where, through the employment of cheap labor, it could produce cash registers which not only could compete in foreign markets and avoid the foreign tariff but could also be shipped duty free to the United States and there sold for a time at least at prices which would destroy their American competitors. Thus under an American free-trade policy in cash registers this concern could evade our antitrust laws and at the same time destroy its American competitors.

Has anyone anywhere heard any complaint from those gentlemen who argue that a protective tariff encourages trusts and monopolies in the United States against the trusts and monopolies abroad whose products it is proposed by these gentlemen to admit free of duty into our country?

Why, sir, I can reach but one conclusion from all this, and that is that certain Senators are more interested in our foreign competitors than they are in the success and prosperity of our own people.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I repeat that this is a most unfavorable time to revise the tariff. The world is in disorder. Prices are in a constant state of flux. Exchanges are in perpetual change. Every nation is employing means to benefit its trade and commerce; is imposing tariffs not only for purposes of revenue but for protection to its industries. The United States is the one great Nation which has the money and credit with which to buy, and to it the foreign ships of commerce are destined. Under these circumstances, what is the present duty of Congress? This question must be answered in the light of present conditions. Clearly it is its duty to secure on at least equal terms the American market for American labor and American producers. The pending bill is before us and it is intended for that purpose. Under the existing conditions I have mentioned the exact rate of duty which measures the difference in the cost of production here and abroad can not be determined in all cases, and in case that tariffs in the bill may prove to be either too high or too low it contains a provision whereby the President, acting, as he no doubt will act, upon the informed advice of the Tariff Commission, can lower or raise a duty so as to measure approximately this difference as world affairs become more normal.

Mr. President, we must go through with this revision. The industry and business of the country demand an early determination of this question. The uncertainty of rates is more disturbing than too high or too low tariffs.

As the consideration of the bill progresses and occasion may seem to require, I shall briefly express my views on some of its items. Until then I shall content myself with this general statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on lines 13 and 14 of page 48 was adopted. I ask this for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to considering the vote as not having been taken?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know now that I shall object; but before that matter is taken up I desire to occupy a few minutes of the time of the Senate to make some general observations with reference to the statements just made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The Senator from Michigan sees fit, at a very inopportune time, I think, to renew against the minority side of this Chamber the old charge of filibustering and to rehash with some elaboration those charges that have heretofore been made and conclusively answered by the presentation of the facts of the situation, at least to the satisfaction of a large part of the Republican newspapers of the United States. Those great newspapers have declared that the situation required all the discussion that it has been getting, and that no more time was being given to the consideration of the bill than was justified by the circumstances; but how any Senator in this body who has been in daily attendance upon the sessions of the Senate since Wednesday of last week could have the audacity—if I may use that term without offense—to make this charge against the Democratic side of the Chamber so far as it refers to the action of the Senate during the past 10 days is beyond my comprehension.

Of course, I know that many Senators—in fact, a large majority of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber—have not attended our sessions during these discussions. I am inclined to think the Senator from Michigan is in that category. They have very frequently absented themselves from the Chamber, leaving nobody here on the other side except the whip and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in special charge of the bill. I do not know why they have absented themselves. I have sometimes suspected that they were afraid if they stayed in the Chamber they might be convinced and might find it hard in good conscience to carry out their understanding to vote solidly with the committee for the amendments, no matter whether they were good or bad. Anyhow, they have refused to hear the discussions, which I think the country believes, and those who have heard them I am sure believe, have been very enlightening. I am sure the majority of the committee have in truth regarded these discussions as very enlightening to themselves.

Mr. President, I am not surprised that Senators who have not attended these discussions should be misled into conceiving the idea that the length of time the bill has been under discussion is due to filibustering tactics and to irrelevant discussion. If they had stayed in the Chamber and listened to the discussions they would have known that they were not of a dilatory character, that they were not of an impertinent or an irrelevant character, but that when this bill has been before the Senate, has not been excluded and pushed aside by some other matter—the sidetracking being very frequently consented to by the chairman of the Finance Committee—our discussions have been confined almost absolutely to the particular schedules under consideration and there has been very little of the debate that was not of a direct and positive character.

During the past 10 days, however, Mr. President, beginning, I think, with last Thursday, the bill has not really been very much before the Senate. I believe for five whole days, or four and a half days—I am not quite certain—we have had up for discussion the naval bill. That bill was brought up by the consent of the chairman of the Finance Committee. Nobody claimed that the discussions upon that bill were unusual. Nobody claimed that this side of the Chamber was engaged in filibustering against the naval bill. We are not responsible for the fact that the naval bill has taken 4 or 5 days of the past 10 days of the session of the Senate. Again, after we disposed of the naval bill on Monday, having had it under consideration for more than four days, on the next day some extraneous matters were injected into the debate. Nobody could hold this side of the Chamber responsible for them. They provoked extended discussion on both sides of the Chamber. A day was consumed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator say that all of Tuesday was consumed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not specify any particular day.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator said a day was consumed, did he not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, practically one day was lost from the discussion of the bill; yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will yield further, three hours were consumed, and yesterday from 11 o'clock until nearly 7 almost all the time was taken up with three speeches. One of them was the twenty-seventh or the twenty-eighth speech on the Federal reserve bank and the other two speeches did not contribute one new thing to this debate. They went over the whole ground that had been gone over before many times.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I remember, Mr. President, that the Senator from Minnesota on one occasion during the period of time that I am discussing injected a speech——

Mr. CARAWAY. A campaign speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. A campaign speech, a political discussion of the tariff, which naturally provoked answer from this side of the Chamber. That took a good part of a day. On the next day the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] made another speech, exhibiting a great many articles, a repetition of the speech and the exhibit made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. That provoked discussion on this side of the Chamber, which was further answered on the other side of the Chamber, and took quite a long time. Then, Mr. President, the soldiers' adjusted compensation matter was brought up here, and that took practically a whole day, or a very large part of a day.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a minute?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to know how much of really intelligent contribution was the cukoo-clock show and the monkey performance that took place over here?

Mr. SIMMONS. Whatever may be said about that, it was the same line of facts, the same line of argument, that had been pursued. It was a repetition, in fact, of the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Then, as I say, the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill was taken up, and the other side of the Chamber participated in that discussion, as well as did this side of the Chamber; and as an outcome of that discussion, late in the day, after we had wrangled about it here during the whole day, a proposition was brought in by the other side of the Chamber to fix definitely the time when that bill should be made the unfinished business of the Senate. Then on yesterday it is claimed that there was filibustering on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, such a discussion, as is natural and such as always happens as we proceed here with our business, broke out between two Senators, which took time, but nobody and no party is justly to be charged with filibustering on account of those circumstances. I think something over an hour—it may be an hour and a half—was consumed on yesterday in discussing that matter, and after that was out of the way we took up the tariff bill.

We discussed the subject of chains for a considerable length of time. That may or may not be an important item in the estimation of the Senator from Michigan, but there are thousands of people in this country who have to buy those chains who think it is a very important matter. Of articles not produced on the farm there is none used more extensively on the farm than the chain in all forms, and we had a proposition before us to impose a high duty upon those chains, which are actually being imported into this country at this time in the amount of less than one-third of the imports which came in during the life of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Getting back to the charge of filibustering, I do not think anybody except the Senator from Michigan thinks that during the past 10 days the Democrats have consumed any considerable length of time in filibustering, if they have consumed any at all. I do not think the impression of anybody who has heard these discussions during that period of time has been that the Democrats were filibustering against the tariff bill and that the time that was taken in the consideration and discussion of matters other than the tariff was due to filibustering by the Democrats against the tariff. Indeed, Mr. President, a number of newspaper correspondents have asked me the question of whether or not the Republicans were filibustering against their own bill. The impression has been that most of the time during the past 10 days has been taken up by the other side, instead of by this side of the Chamber.

The Senator from Michigan said that not a single helpful suggestion has been made in all these discussions by the opponents of this bill. I do not question that we have been unable to make any suggestion helpful to the Senator from Michigan, because my recollection is that the Senator from Michigan was but very little in the Chamber while we were discussing the bill, and unless the Senator from Michigan confines himself to a very close reading of the RECORD, being absent while we were discussing the bill, he could not, of course, receive any helpful suggestion from this side of the Chamber.

What we in these discussions desired was to reach the majority members of the Finance Committee, because we had discovered that the rank and file of the Republicans on the other side of the Chamber had come to the understanding that these amendments proposed by the committee were to be adopted by a party vote and, with one or two exceptions, had been adhering to that purpose. We knew, therefore, that we could not reach them except through the committee, and that if there was to be any modification of these excessive rates the initiative must come from the committee. We have, therefore, been finding that we could not reach the other side because of misunderstanding, in the first place; and, in the second place, because of their habitual absence from the Chamber. We have had to address ourselves largely to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is assisting the chairman in the management of the bill upon the floor. Our effort has been to reach them.

Have we reached them? If they have acted upon any of our suggestions, I suppose they have acted upon them because they thought they were helpful suggestions. What have we witnessed here since these discussions began? I need not spend any time in telling the Senate what we have witnessed, because not only the Senate has seen it but the country has seen it, and the press is full of it. We have reached the committee by our suggestions and our facts and argument, and day after day the committee has been sitting over yonder in its room, and day after day as a result of those sittings the committee itself has brought in amendments materially and radically changing and modifying the rates which they had first proposed.

On yesterday we had an instance of this. The committee brought in an amendment upon this chain matter which reduced the rate from at least 45 per cent ad valorem, according to the Senator from Utah, to less than 20 per cent, although I think the Senator was badly mistaken in his arithmetic. So we reached the committee upon that, as we have upon many amendments. In fact, Mr. President, the information was given the Senate on yesterday that there had been material reductions made by the committee in at least a hundred cases; certainly they have brought in over a hundred amendments, and most of them have been amendments reducing the rates in this bill. So that our suggestions have been regarded by the committee not only as helpful but as sufficiently compelling to bring forth from them this fruit about which I have been telling.

The truth about the business is that this bill has been dragging somewhat during the past 8 or 10 days, but it has been dragging not on account of any filibustering on this side; it has been dragging because the Finance Committee have been rewriting the bill. They have been sending out and getting up additional evidence. They have been making additional investigations, the need for which we have pointed out, and during that time they have been engaged in the process of practically rewriting the bill. Nobody has seen any particular effort on the part of the Finance Committee to press the consideration of the tariff bill during the past 10 days.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in all fairness, does the Senator recall a single time when the committee have asked delay in the consideration of a single item in the bill, or evidenced lack of a desire to press the bill as rapidly as possible?

Mr. SIMMONS. I meant to convey this idea—and I think the fact has been observed by all people who have witnessed our proceedings here—that during the past 10 days the committee have not seemed to be as much on the alert or as eager and impatient to press the bill forward as they were prior to that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Has there been a time I could have pressed the bill when I failed to do it? When Senators were offering resolutions and taking up hours on them, I knew of no way to stop it. I would stop it if I knew how to stop it, and stop it very quickly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I say that it has appeared to me, and it has appeared to others, and has been much remarked upon, that during the past 10 days the committee have not seemed to be pressing the bill to the extent and to the degree that they were pressing it before, and I have been asked the reason why.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator again. Of course, the Senator understands that the appropriation bills must be passed before July. He understands that we must yield and lay aside the tariff bill for that purpose. We have not yielded in a single instance, unless for a little bridge bill, or some similar measure, which would take only a moment. Of course, outside matters have been argued. We can not help that. I would like to prevent it, and I wish I could get the Senator to join with me and prevent the discussion of extraneous matters and go ahead with the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knows I have been as anxious as he to have the tariff bill kept before the Senate, and the Senator knows I am no more responsible for any delay than he is. I, as the ranking member of the committee directing the matter on this side of the Chamber, am no more responsible for these matters being injected than is the Senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the committee, on the other side of the Chamber. He is more responsible when he lays the bill aside for the purpose of taking up some other bill than I am because he controls the consideration of the measure, and I do not. But the other interruptions which have taken place I am no more responsible for, and no other Member of the minority is any more responsible for, than is the Senator from North Dakota, or than are the majority members of the committee. I do not wish to attack the committee or the majority members of the committee, but I do defend this side of the Chamber against the absurd charge that during the past 10 days we have taken up time unnecessarily, with the deliberate purpose of trying to delay the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator join with the members of the committee, and object to every request for the consideration of a bill, resolution, or anything else while this bill is under consideration, with the exception of the appropriation bills?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that there is no man in this Chamber who is more anxious to confine the discussion, and every minute of our time, to the consideration of this bill than I am. If ever a man wanted to get through with a thing and be done with it, I want to get through with this mess and be done with it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am mighty glad to hear the Senator say that; but when we have a spectacle such as we had yesterday——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not yield to the Senator for the purpose of having him assail a minority member of the committee, who, in his own way, and with great ability and effectiveness, saw fit to make a speech against the bill on yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not assailing what he said or what he believed, but I am saying if you will read the RECORD you will find that what he said yesterday had been put in the RECORD time and time again; and I do not understand how any Senator can do it, unless he wants to delay.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think it is quite parliamentary for one Senator to stand here and criticize the speech of another Senator in the way the Senator from Utah has criticized the speech of the Senator from New Mexico. I wish the Senator from New Mexico were in the Chamber; but in his absence I want to say that if the Senator repeated, as probably he inevitably did in some instances, he was not doing more than is the custom of practically every Senator when we are discussing a matter of this sort. I have heard the Senator from North Dakota repeat himself many times during this discussion, and I have heard the Senator from Utah repeat himself many times during this discussion.

In discussing the emergency tariff bill the Senator from North Dakota, who is deeply interested in the subject of wheat, made so many wheat speeches, each so much like the other, that I almost learned the speech by heart. That always happens when a man is deeply interested in a subject; he is likely to repeat himself. I sometimes repeat myself; the Senator from Utah sometimes repeats himself. It is inevitable in discussing a bill containing thousands of items, to many of which the same rule and same principle must be applied.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will find any repetition of any speech I have made here, I shall be very much obliged to him. But I simply call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when a speech is repeated time and time again, and three hours are taken of the time of the Senate with it, there must be some reason for it. The Senator from New Mexico had a perfect right to speak as he did; I do not say he did not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not have the good fortune to hear all the speech of the Senator from New Mexico on yesterday. I heard a part of it, and a part of it was matter which was entirely new as coming from this side of the Chamber, and it was in response to something which had been brought out by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

The Senator from Indiana had taken occasion to discuss very extensively the question of German wages, and the Senator from New Mexico on yesterday devoted a large part of his very able speech to an answer to that. It was a very appropriate answer, for the time had come when it was necessary and proper, in the interest of an understanding of the bill and what it does to the people of the country, and the pretext upon which it does it, to have the matter of German wages fully elucidated and explained to the Senate, in order that the Senate and the country might understand how an attempt is being made here to get high rates of duties upon a false and a fake case as to wages here and abroad. It was a very proper discussion, and the whole of the Senator's speech, I know, without having heard all of it, was illuminating. If there was some repetition it is not more than occurs with all able men when day after day they are discussing the same general subject, as we are doing, in connection with the tariff. But I know enough about the Senator from New Mexico and his familiarity with and knowledge of the bill to say that he will not indulge in any discussion in this Chamber that is frivolous or that is unnecessary or that is not pertinent, and when he does discuss the bill he discusses it with a fullness of knowledge not surpassed by any man upon the other side of the Chamber and with a degree of force and logical power and compelling argument which no man on the other side of the Chamber can excel.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to say that that could be inferred from anything I said?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me finish what I am saying?

Mr. SMOOT. Because I never said any such thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. When a Senator representing his constituents, speaking the convictions of his mind and his heart, stands here and consumes some time in an illuminating discussion of the bill, in an exposure of some of its fatal weaknesses, and he is held up the next day in his absence as filibustering, and the very character of his speech is to be criticized, I say it is an unseemly, an unparliamentary performance, unworthy of the Senators who engage in it. I see that the Senator from New Mexico is now here. He can defend himself. I do not need to say anything further.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the best way to prove that we are not unnecessarily killing time is to take up the schedules, discuss them reasonably, and then vote on them. Now, we are not doing that. I am not complaining because some Senator thinks he has to make a general speech upon the bill for home consumption. I shall not complain if he feels that he ought to deviate and make such a speech upon some other bill. We all have the habit of doing that more or less. But I do not think merely because we yield for the consideration of an appropriation bill that the Senator from North Carolina can properly charge the committee or anyone connected with it with not pressing the bill as vigorously as possible.

The time that we yield for the consideration and passage of a bridge bill or some similar little matter, or for a conference report, does not amount to anything. No particular time has been taken up in the discussion of those matters to which we have yielded, with the exception possibly of appropriation bills.

Now, Mr. President, I want to get on with the pending bill. We have taken an excessively long time in the discussion of matters which are entirely outside of the tariff bill. I am not going to say that it is on the other side of the Chamber or on this side of the Chamber. It makes no difference where it comes from, it delays. I am not going to charge any filibustering. I simply say that we are not giving the attention we ought to give to the bill. We are not giving the exclusive attention that we should give to this particular measure.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], always a good speaker, merely told us this morning that his side of the Chamber was not filibustering. That could have been told in 3 minutes as well as in 30 minutes. It is the long speeches, the repetition of speeches, of which we have a right to complain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator must admit that a good part of my speech was devoted to defending the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] from the charge of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. McCUMBER. Two minutes of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not talking about a filibuster all the time. I was talking about the action of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator's statement in which he asserts that the majority of the committee at least have received valuable information from the discussions on the other side. I am always glad to receive information from either side, and so is every member of the committee. It is but fair to the committee, however, to repeat what I said in the very beginning of the discussion of the bill—that we were going to meet every morning at 11 o'clock; that we were going over the matters even that we had passed over, and wherever we could see that we could reasonably lower what we had recommended we were going to do it. I also stated that some of the items over which there was no contest had not, even at the time we reported the bill, been given the consideration that we would otherwise have given to them had not so much of our time been taken up with contested matters. Those were the particular things which we expected to have the committee work on morning after morning. That for the main part is what we have been doing.

Our amendments have been made not after discussion on the floor but in every case where we have made amendments, with the exception, I think, of one or two paragraphs, they have been made before the matters were discussed upon the floor of the Senate. But that does not make the discussion less pertinent, and I certainly am glad to have any fair criticism of any paragraph or schedule. We want to try to make the bill as nearly right as we can, but I do hope that we will stop talking about filibustering on either side and get right down to the bill and discuss the items.

I have asked for a reconsideration of the vote by which one item was agreed to in order that I may offer an amendment which will be a reduction, as in most instances we shall recommend reductions, I think. There will be some items as to which we are going to recommend a slight increase, but if we can get down to them, speak a reasonable length of time upon them, and then vote, no one can complain on either side.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will my good friend the Senator from North Dakota permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. We have been going on here from the 20th day of April recessing from day to day and having one legislative day. I sympathize with the Senator's view that there has been a good deal of discussion of matters which were not pertinent to the bill, but I have been impressed with this thought: If we could perhaps have one morning hour each week, or two morning hours each week, so that matters which Senators feel are of very great importance to them could be discussed and disposed of, my belief is that we would make better time with the pending tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is a good suggestion, and I wish that we could arrange to have those matters disposed of. If I thought we could bring about a result of that character and then give the balance of the day or the balance of the time to the tariff bill, I certainly would gladly consent to such an arrangement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the reason why I rose when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] concluded his political speech was not because it was a political speech. It is, of course, perfectly natural that Senators on either side of the Chamber who are facing political battles should make political speeches. I am not rising now because the chairman of the Finance Committee has just lectured us on the time that has been taken up in the consideration of the bill and is insisting on its passage, when he has taken more time in telling the Senate how to pass the bill than most of us have taken in the actual discussion of the merits of the bill.

I rise now to challenge a statement contained in the speech of the Senator from Michigan which I am not willing to allow to pass without challenge. I refer to the statement of the Senator from Michigan, when arguing in favor of a protective tariff, that we have now reached a time when all men are in favor of a protective tariff of some kind or other, when if they are not in favor of a protective tariff on matters which are not of interest to them they do stand for the principle of protection with reference to matters in which they are personally interested or in which their constituents are interested. That is not the exact language of the Senator, because his speech has not yet been reduced to writing and I have not seen it, but that is the substance of the charge which was made.

Mr. President, if that statement were true, the Democratic Party should retire from this floor. If that statement were true, the Democratic Party should no longer contest the items in the bill, because if our position in reference to taxation at the customshouse is not based on principle, we might just as well abandon the fight which has been made for decades in the past.

What difference does it make if a special privilege is granted to some one if it is not wrong in principle? I am not willing to allow any Senator to rise on the floor of the Senate and make that statement without challenge. I have had a record in these two bodies for over a quarter of a century, and during that time I have largely dealt with legislation affecting customs tariff taxation. I know that, for one, no man can put his finger on an item that has ever appeared in any customs tariff bill in the framing of which I have assisted where I have yielded one iota on the principle that tariff taxes should be levied for revenue only and not to build up and put money in the pockets of special interests. That is also true of the great rank and file of the men who maintain the principles of democracy in either Chamber of the Congress. Sometimes there are men who bear the commissions as Democrats, who believe, in the main, in the principles of the Democratic Party in reference to other questions, who are protectionists; and, as I said the other day, I have known a few Republicans who are free traders; but in either case it is an exception to the rule; it is not the rule itself. To try to build up an idea that this bill—the most indefensible tariff taxation that was ever attempted to be levied by a Congress of the United States—is right and to attempt to justify it by the statements that all men have now become indoctrinated with the evils of a protective tariff—I do not think that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], whom I regard as a man of high character, a distinguished Member of this body, had carefully considered his language before he made so radical a statement in reference to his colleagues who differ from him in reference to the theory of taxing the people at the customhouse.

Mr. President, when it comes to the theory of the customs taxation, the dividing line is so clearly drawn that men should be able to read as they run. There can be no question as to where the principle involved rests. Men who believe in the theory that is called the tariff for revenue theory, possibly for revenue only, for a lack of a better name, in fact believe that the customhouse is a convenient place to levy taxes; but in levying taxes at the customhouse the primary purpose involved should be the collection of revenue for the Government of the United States, and no ulterior motive should be involved.

The men who believe in the protective-tariff system believe, I have no doubt, that the customhouse is a convenient place to levy revenue, and they believe, in the collection of that revenue, that tariff laws should be so adjusted as to build up the profits of special interests in America; that the wall of taxation should be so builded as to divert the purchasing power of the consuming masses of the American people to the payment of higher prices into the pockets of special interests. That may be expressing the question very broadly, but it is true; it can not be contested, because, if you stand for protection, by protection you proclaim that you give better profits to the American manufacturer and better wages to the American laborer. Sometimes you do and sometimes you do not; sometimes your theory works, sometimes it does not; but that is your theory, and you can only accomplish the fruition of that theory by raising the prices above what they would be if you had not made a customs law taxing the man outside the wall. Therefore you build a wall to raise the price to the American consumer in order that you may take his money and put it in the pockets of special interests. That is the position that the Republican Party has always occupied. The Republican advocate and the Republican orator do not state it as broadly and as boldly, and possibly it might be said as offensively, as I have just stated it; but that is the fact and that is the theory of protection. The theory is to make one man pay for and build up another man's interests. The Democratic theory—and it is called the Democratic theory because most of the followers of that theory are in the Democratic column, although some of them are not—is that this great power of taxation should not be used to discriminate between American people and to build up some one man's business at the expense of another man. That theory is followed by the rank and file of the Democracy of America, and is followed by most of the Democratic Senators who hold commissions in this Chamber. That being the case, as it goes to the fundamental principle, I was not willing to allow the Senator from Michigan to make the assertion which he did make and let it pass unchallenged.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was surprised to hear the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] make the charge that the Democrats are obstructing the passage of the tariff bill, especially in view of what happened day before yesterday, to which the attention of the Senate has been called. On that day we met at 11 o'clock and continued in session until about 6 o'clock. During the whole day Republican Senators occupied the floor making speeches. Shortly after the Senate met the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] began the Republican oratory; when he took his seat the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] addressed the Senate; then the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] occupied considerable time; then the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] spoke quite extensively, and he was followed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD]. So the whole day was taken up by the filibuster upon the part of the majority party here in the Senate. Yet the Senator from Michigan, in his mad race for reelection in Michigan, when he is pressed hard, charges this side with filibustering against the tariff bill. I omitted to say that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], I believe, also used a great deal of time with his side show day before yesterday, exhibiting a monkey and other articles which had been imported from Germany.

On yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], a member of the minority, undertook to answer some of the fallacious arguments made by Senators on the other side. The argument of the Senator from Nebraska was clear cut; it was forceful and to the point; he dealt not for one moment with irrelevant matters; but in that speech the Senators who charge this side with delaying the tariff bill undertook to inject themselves time after time, taking up uselessly the time of the Senate with their questions. I have just noted in the RECORD the speech of the Senator from Nebraska on yesterday, and I find to my amazement that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] five different times injected himself into the speech of the Senator from Nebraska, who was doing everything he could to expose the fallacious arguments presented by Senators on the other side, and to do it speedily and briefly and then to conclude his speech in order that the Senate might vote on amendments. Scarcely has the Senate ever listened to such a pointed argument, concisely and logicaly made.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], another leader on the Republican side of the Chamber, also injected himself into the speech of the Senator from Nebraska. The Senator from Utah has been fairly patient; we have not heard so much from him about charges of filibustering upon the part of this side. I presume he has taken a great deal of time filibustering, because he is smart enough and adroit enough and cunning enough and knows politics sufficiently well to try to reform this new tariff bill to some extent and to reduce some of the high rates which have been imposed, so that we do not hear so much from him about this filibuster, because he knows that the filibuster is over there and not here. On yesterday, however, the Senator from Utah injected himself into the speech of the Senator from Nebraska, I believe, 24 times.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], another leader, who directed the side show, the "Punch and Judy" performance, with the monkey and the clock imported from Germany, injected himself 22 times into the speech of the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely wish to remind the Senator from Mississippi that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] did not confine his interruptions to questions. I was present when he made one or two rather extended speeches. At any rate, he indulged in very considerable comment and he did not confine himself merely to questions.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; they were long speeches; he was trying to kill time while a Democratic Senator was trying to expose the iniquities of this nefarious bill. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a member of the Finance Committee, was trying to distract the Senator from Nebraska and to divert the attention of the country by interrupting the clear and forceful argument of the Senator from Nebraska, and so he injected himself into the speech of the Senator from Nebraska 81 times. Yet the Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber say that a filibuster is being conducted on this side, in the face of the fact that there were 132 interruptions and interjections by leaders on the other side of the aisle in the speech of one Democratic Senator on yesterday.

I have not enumerated the many other interjections, but Senators may consult the RECORD for themselves. They will note in one speech yesterday, however, 132 interruptions by four Republican Senators. Yet we read in the Washington Post of this morning in most glaring headlines:

> Cloture fight may sidetrack tariff.
> Senate Republicans plan to obtain new rule limiting debate by majority vote.

The article quotes distinguished Republican leaders, among them the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], as saying that—

> He believed the cloture move would be made.

In this article we find it stated that Republican leaders are willing to talk about the enactment of a cloture rule and sidetrack the tariff question.

Why, those things are coming to pass that we prophesied some time ago and that we believed would come very soon. You feel the force of public opinion. You know that a reaction is setting in from the country. You are hearing from the people, by letter and other representations, that they will not indorse this bill. You are trying to do everything you can to confuse the situation, to distract attention from the legitimate arguments that are made here. Now, when you see what is being said by the Republican press of the country—from the New York Tribune and the New York Herald to the Journal of Commerce and all the other New York papers—the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has read them; he feels the contact; he knows that public opinion is aroused against this bill; the Senators from Pennsylvania know that the press of Pennsylvania, Republican, Democratic, and independent, are denouncing it; the Senators from Illinois know that the influential Republican paper of that State, the Chicago Tribune, is denouncing the bill, editorially and otherwise, you want "to get out from under," and you give out to the country in your propaganda the statement that a cloture rule is going to be passed. Why, you would run from a cloture rule. That is not what you want. You want to deceive the American people, as you have always done. You know the presentation of a cloture means the death of this tariff bill, and you want it to die. It now plagues you. It is a nightmare to you.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. If such a great sentiment is aroused against this tariff bill all over the country, if it is such a bad bill, does not the Senator think it would be to the best interest of the Democratic Party to adopt cloture and pass this bill immediately?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the people will find out what is in this bill in time. They have been aroused merely by a discussion of a part of the schedules. When they hear of your action touching the other schedules and the other amendments—sugar, meat, clothing, those things that the American people must have upon the breakfast table and upon their backs—then these friends who vote for this bill will hear from the folks. An exposé of those provisions must be made, and that is what you do not want. That may be the reason for your advocating a cloture.

Now, you say, there is going to be cloture. You are going to propose it here, and discuss cloture for the rest of the session. If you will stop interjecting 132 times in a Senator's speech, as was done yesterday, and stop taking up the whole day, as was done day before yesterday, in making speeches, many of which are not confined to the subject matter, we can get along with this bill pretty well, and we are going to try and facilitate it by cooperating with you; but we are going to expose your infamy in the preparation of this bill. When we have done it, then, if you have votes enough, the bill can be passed, and in November you will repent in sackcloth and ashes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Mississippi state again how many times the Senator from Utah interrupted the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in his speech yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. His name appears in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska yesterday 24 times.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what the Senator said. The Senator said that the Senator from Utah interrupted the Senator from Nebraska 24 times.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I say now.

Mr. SMOOT. I say it is not so.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator claims that when a Senator gets up and says to the Chair, "Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?" and so forth, that is not an interruption, then, of course, he has not counted as I have counted; but his name appears 24 times in the speech of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. I have counted them.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator to find them.

Mr. HARRISON. I will read the speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked him three questions. If the Senator can find any more than that, let him do so.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to read them. I am not only going to find them; I have already found them.

Mr. SMOOT. Read where I interrupted the Senator 24 times. I ask the Senator to do it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to do it, if the Senator will have a little patience.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will have to count again.

Mr. HARRISON. I was reading from the RECORD of Friday, June 23, 1922. I am afraid the Senator gave me the wrong one.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not give the Senator the wrong one. I gave him the right one.

Mr. HARRISON. All right. On page 1 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, No. 162, if the Senator will follow me, under "The tariff," where "Mr. HITCHCOCK obtained the floor," the Senator will find his name once, right under that headline. That is one.

Mr. SMOOT. "Mr. President."

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; "Mr. President."

Mr. SMOOT. All right; go on.

Mr. HARRISON. Then turn over the page, and the Senator will find his name again, "Mr. SMOOT."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is two.

Mr. HARRISON. That was quite a long interjection there. Then the Senator from Nebraska answered him, and said, "I am glad to hear it"; and then the Senator from Utah gave a long discourse on chain and chains of all kinds. That is three.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just six lines. That is three.

Mr. HARRISON. Wait a minute; I have not finished. That is three. Then the Senator from Nebraska answered him again; and then, if the Senator will look, he will find that there is another long interruption.

Mr. SMOOT. Where?

Mr. HARRISON. Right there where the Senator said "The Payne-Aldrich tariff contained the provision," and so forth. I do not want to read the speech, because it is bad reading.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I know it is to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Now follow that on down. We will go a little further in that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; go right along. Now, find another interruption in the speech, please.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think I got them wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator did.

Mr. HARRISON. If I did, then, the other one spoke twenty-four times.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator said "The Senator from Utah." Those are all the interruptions I made, and they are only about 15 lines, in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska. There are no 24 interruptions by me.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, let us see. I counted them.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator has not counted the other things that he has stated here any better than he has that——

Mr. HARRISON. Wait a minute. Now, if the Senator will go over on page 9230, just a few pages from the first interruption, at the close of the speech——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, of course. Now, let us go on.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. That is not the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I hate to see the Senator from Utah engaged in this filibuster with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Wait a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will see on page 9227 that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] begins in the middle of the first column.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is a continuation of his speech, which starts on page 9227, and the Senator has 12 interruptions in one column on page 9230, and in the next column his interruptions take up practically the whole page. So, Mr. President, that is the way they proceed in these speeches, interjecting and interrupting and filibustering, and now they try to take up my time by prolonging this discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the way in which statements are made upon this floor. I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska only four times. In one case I simply said "Mr. President," and the other times my remarks were very brief, not to exceed 15 or 16 lines altogether; and yet I have been charged here with interrupting the Senator from Nebraska 24 times.

Mr. HARRISON. That was a prolonged discussion. The Senator will find that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] interrupted 81 times. I was very conservative in the estimates; and he will find that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] interrupted 22 times, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] interrupted 5 times, and the Senator is overlooking the fact that I paid him a very great tribute before I referred to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I have nothing to say except just what the facts are, Mr. President; that is all. I have not counted the interruptions that the Senator from Connecticut made.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator do that?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how many there were, but I do know that the Senator from Utah interrupted the Senator from Nebraska only 3 times instead of 24.

Mr. HARRISON. Three times? I read five times in the first column.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator did not read five times.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not think it is an interruption when he says "Mr. President," and takes the time of the Senate? There is an interjection right there.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, even with "Mr. President" there are only four times.

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped that the Senator and I could agree on something. We can not agree on the tariff, but I had hoped we could agree on something.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Utah can always agree upon facts. That is what we can agree upon, if the Senator will agree to the facts. I say that my name is mentioned in the speech of the Senator from Nebraska only four times, and one time I simply rose and said "Mr. President," and that is all. The other three times I was either answering a question or directing a question to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] asks a reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to which has been stated by the Secretary. Is there objection to the reconsideration? The Chair hears none. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I came into the Chamber just as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was concluding his remarks this morning, and I inferred from what he said that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] had accused me of filibustering on this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator let me say what I did say, and not what the Senator from North Carolina gave the impression that I said?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina was claiming that no time was taken in the discussion of this bill on the part of any Member on the Democratic side that was not absolutely necessary to the explanation of the bill, and I asked the Senator from North Carolina how he could make that statement in view of the fact that the Senator from New Mexico had taken nearly three hours on yesterday, and during his speech had repeated time and time again statements that he had made on the floor of the Senate in relation to the very bill that we had under discussion. That is what I said, and I think the Senator will agree with me in the statement that he repeated a good many things that have been said time and time again. Then I further said that the Senator from New Mexico had a perfect right as a Senator to say what he did say yesterday, but that I could not understand why the repetition was made.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not believe that on yesterday I repeated anything that I had previously uttered on the floor of the Senate. I stated at that time that the propositions which I was discussing had been discussed before, and testimony had been put into the RECORD. I specifically refrained from repeating what the testimony was, and everything that was put into the RECORD by me on yesterday appears in the RECORD for the first time in these discussions. It was the first time I had attempted to discuss the sideshow of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

So far as filibustering is concerned, the real purpose of my remarks on yesterday was to prevent filibustering, to prevent delay. When the Senator from North Dakota put on his sideshow here, he expressly stated that it had nothing to do with this bill. He said that he put on that show for the purpose of showing the profits that the importers were making, and for the purpose of showing that the press of this country was corrupt, and had been purchased by the advertisers.

The Senator from Indiana on day before yesterday claimed a wider application for the show which he staged and said that it did relate to the bill, and that there were to be a number of other side shows of a similar character staged in this Chamber. I do not believe the Senator from Utah has any notion that the side shows have any bearing on the merits of this bill. That is where the filibustering has come from. As I stated on yesterday, they have not been discussing this bill, but they have been trying to divert the attention of the people of the country from the bill by putting on these spectacular displays; and when we were told by the Senator from Indiana day before yesterday that that procedure was to continue, I felt that it was time that other Senators should at least have sufficient before them to inform them that such proceedings had no bearing upon this bill.

If there is one thing that is continually being pressed from the other side of the Chamber, without limit during the discussion of the bill and in the side plays, it is the menace of Germany, and I thought it was time that that argument should be buried under a shower of facts to such an extent that it would remain buried. Every time any question is raised on the floor about these exorbitant and extortionate rates we are told about something from Germany, and if the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will stop conjuring up this ghost of Germany the argument on this side will follow another course.

Mr. President, I do not wonder that Senators on the other side—and I do not include the Senator from Utah—are trying to divert attention from this bill; but the press of the country is aroused against it, and I can quite understand why they want to divert the attention of the country from the bill. I do not care to take up time in this discussion any further.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I interrupt the Senator from New Mexico to show something in regard to the prices paid in Germany?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hold in my hand a package which has not yet been unsealed. It was not addressed to me, but it came to another. I have seen one of them. It is a small magazine, I imagine of the kind published in this country for about a dollar. I wish the Senator would open it and see how much it costs to publish that magazine in Germany, to show whether or not they are doing things as cheaply in Germany. I will ask the Senator to tear it open, and he will find on the first inside page a postal card containing the publisher's notice of the cost. Now, will the Senator state what is the yearly price?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Two thousand six hundred marks.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the mark was worth what it ordinarily is, that would be $750. Yet Senators on the other side talk about things being done cheaply in Germany.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I find editorials this morning in two of the leading papers of the country which, I think, might very well be transmitted to the people through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to read these editorials, but they are not commendatory of this bill. Here is an editorial headed "Tariff Revision Fallacies," in the first column of the editorial page of the New York Tribune, which I ask to have inserted in 8-point type, without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, June 24, 1922.]

TARIFF REVISION FALLACIES.

"The Fordney and McCumber tariff bills were framed with little regard to economic tendencies. They ignore the vast alteration brought about by the war in America's economic relations to the rest of the world. One would imagine from the arguments offered by the defenders of these bills that the United States was incapable of competing with other nations outside its own boundaries and that our manufacturers could compete at home with foreign manufacturers only through the aid of nearly prohibitive tariff duties.

"This is not the case. Our exports far exceed our imports and have been growing enormously. In the fiscal year 1919–20 exports were valued at $8,108,000,000 and imports at $5,239,000,000. In the fiscal year 1920–21 exports were valued at $6,516,000,000 and imports at $3,654,000,000. In 1913–14 our exports were $2,364,000,000 and our imports were $1,893,000,000.

"The American manufacturer has not been prevented from competing in foreign markets since the war by cheap European competition. Our exports for April of this year were 98 per cent larger than those for April, 1914. In the same month our imports were only 25 per cent larger than those for April, 1914. We have steadily become more of an exporting and less of an importing nation. But no one would ever guess that from the stress laid in Congress on the need of further protecting American producers from outside competition.

"Of our imports more than half have come in free since 1910–11 and more than 40 per cent since 1890–91. The percentage of nondutiable exports in 1919–20 was 61.08; in 1918–19 it was 70.84. Hardly a third of our imports of $3,654,000,000 in 1920–21 were taxed. Yet industry at home has expanded and exports have nearly tripled since 1914.

"These facts show that there is no reason to be alarmed over the situation. The latter has not changed to our detriment. The emergency tariff act relieved those producers who felt temporarily the pressure of bothersome foreign competition. We have plenty of time ahead in which to construct a rational, fairly scientific tariff. The leaders in Congress are not in a frame of mind to do anything of that sort now."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In the New York Herald there is another editorial, entitled "Mend the Tariff-Making System." I ask that that be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

[From the New York Herald, June 24, 1922.]

MEND THE TARIFF-MAKING SYSTEM.

"Nobody in his economic senses, or, for the matter of that, in his political senses, can question the imperative need of the reform in making tariffs urged by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN with his amendment to the McCumber measure. He says, and says truly, that there never has been a time when any tariff, Republican or Democratic, was made with an exact knowledge of all the facts in the country's situation.

"This was bad enough under normal conditions when great tariff students in Congress, men of natural brain power and broad experience, were intrusted with the responsibility of writing tariff schedules for American industry and the American public. It is a positive menace now, when industrial and financial conditions are in chaos over the greater part of Europe and when the responsibility of meeting the great problem in our Congress has fallen into the hands of economic charlatans, political tricksters, and sordid logrollers.

"If the country does not get the services of the kind of permanent tariff commission Senator FRELINGHUYSEN proposes in his amendment, if that commission is not vested with powers enough to let it master the facts and technicalities of world economic conditions, along with the true situation of American industry and business, and if Congress lawmakers are not willing to construct tariffs on the basis of the fundamental facts and the technical conditions presented by the expert work of such a commission—if this reform does not come and come at once to replace the present unsound and dangerous system of making tariffs, then the country is in a fair way to go on the tariff rocks.

"Aside and apart from the question of whether it is now too late to rid the Fordney-McCumber measure of its tariff excesses and save the country from the perils they threaten, the Frelinghuysen proposal must appeal to Republicans and Democrats alike who are sound in their heads and honest in their public conduct. It is for a party to determine its tariff policy, whether it is to be a high or a low tariff, a tariff merely on manufactures, a tariff for protection, or a tariff for revenue only. It is for the voters of the United States to accept the party policy they wish to have put into force.

"But whether it is a low-tariff policy, a high-tariff policy, or whatever kind of policy that is to be carried out, no party in control of the Government can ignore the facts and defy the laws of economics without making a wretched botch out of its tariff measure.

"In the United States to-day there are Republicans and protectionists by the hundreds of thousands who are asking one another whether the party leaders in Congress have gone crazy over the tariff. There are Republicans and protectionists by the tens of thousands who believe that the Fordney-McCumber tariff will destroy their party. This is becoming a national sentiment which is immeasurable in its political possibilities.

"In such desperate circumstances it is time for all Republicans in Congress who have not lost their senses over the tariff to try to save the day, not merely with the admirable and necessary principles of the Frelinghuysen amendment but with opposition to the Fordney-McCumber monstrosities to the last ditch."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the publication handed the Senator from New Mexico came to a Member of the House and was given to me. This is a little magazine of 16 pages, counting the advertising pages, and the yearly subscription is 2,600 marks. A magazine like that would cost $1 in this country; I do not think more than that. Being a technical magazine it possibly might cost $2. It bears on the question of whether production is cheap in Germany. I do not think that fact settles the question of whether the rates in this proposed measure are just or unjust. It comes as near it, however, as the show which has been conducted from time to time on the other side of the Chamber.

Day before yesterday I called attention to the very appropriateness of the opening of the show, which the Republicans staged, as I suggested, with a cuckoo and closed with a monkey. There is more material in reserve, as I understand, among them that very necessary household utensil, a roulette wheel; a statue of a lady who is minus her clothes, and a bottle of stewed prunes. Which august Senator on the other side will be permitted to put that show on I do not know. I suggested a moment ago to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that that ought to be his part. He has been complaining that other people have had more of the time than he has, and I want him to have that part, because he is always present, and those who have been putting on the other shows only come in to be the ringmaster, and then go away.

I want to lay down this proposition about the shows and the spread of prices they say they prove, that either the Republican majority which puts on the shows know that the spread claimed do not represent the ordinary spread in imported goods, and therefore they are deliberately deceiving the country, or attempting to deceive it, or they do know that the tariff bill which they are writing has no power to protect the American manufacturer, because, taking the cuckoo clock which they said was typical—and I think it was typical of the party—there was a spread of 2,240 per cent. If they intended to say to the manufacturers of cuckoo clocks, "We are going to write a bill that will equalize the cost of production here and abroad; in other words, we are going to give you a tariff rate which will equalize the cost of your product here with that of the manufacturer of cuckoo clocks in Germany," they would have to write a rate of 2,240 per cent.

The average spread of rates, as contended by the Senator from North Dakota when he was performing, is something between 1,600 and 1,800 per cent. If he believed, and honestly believed, that he was representing the ordinary spread between the cost of imported articles and the selling price in America, if he wants to protect the American manufacturer, he will have to write a rate of duty between sixteen and eighteen hundred per cent. In other words, he must serve notice upon the American consuming public that in order to preserve American industry he intends to raise the cost of living 1,600 per cent. If it does not mean that, if your show was not intended to convince the public that that was the ordinary spread, the ordinary difference between the importers' price and the selling price of the articles in America, you were practicing a fraud. If you intended to convey that idea, then, if the public believed you, they will know that your tariff bill does not protect at all.

I believe it is admitted that it is going to raise no more revenue than is raised under the law on the statute books. It will raise the cost of living, but it will bring no more dollars to the Treasury. It will protect no American industry, if your show is a real representation of the difference between the price of the imported article and the price of the American article.

So, without being offensive, you must accept one of two conclusions; either you are intentionally and deliberately undertaking to deceive the American public as to the importers' profits or else you are writing a tariff bill which in your heart you know will do nothing towards protecting American industry and American working people. It makes no difference how zealous a partisan one may be, he knows that if the ordinary spread between the price of the imported article and the cost of that article in America is 1,600 per cent, no tariff bill carrying a rate such as this would protect American industry. Therefore you must admit, and you can not deny it and keep your self-respect, that either the shows you were putting on were deliberate attempts to mislead the public as to the cost abroad, or else you are writing a bill which you know will not protect American manufacture and American workingmen. I know that you know that is true.

On the other hand, it is the severest indictment of this administration that anybody has ever dared make. We have an Attorney General for whose high character the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] vouched on one occasion. I do not know whether he would do it again or not, since the Attorney General accused the Senator from Indiana of belonging to the Ananias class; but he was his personal and political friend. The Attorney General undertook to make the American consumer believe that he was going to investigate the American retailer and ascertain if they were not guilty of profiteering, with a threat of prosecution.

If he knows the figures you are submitting—although the Senator from North Dakota said he would not betray the people who were profiteering on the people—if he knows about it, and permits people to profiteer to the average extent of sixteen or eighteen hundred per cent and will not act, I say it is the severest indictment against your administration anybody has dared bring.

They, the proponents of this measure, are practicing a fraud upon the American public and deceiving them, or practicing a fraud upon the manufacturing industries of the country and deceiving them by pretending that they were writing a bill to protect them, a bill that would equalize the cost of production here and abroad. Everybody must know that. Everyone must know that unless he looks upon this whole proceeding as a farce. I take for granted, however, and I base that upon comments in the newspapers, that no one believed when "they" put on the show in the Senate that it represented a fair spread between the importation price and the selling price of the foreign manufactured goods. Not anybody, even their own party papers, believed it. Their party organization did not believe it. Nobody believed it. I do not think the Senators who put on the show believed it, because I accredit them with good sense.

But what an indictment it would be against the Senator from North Dakota if he believed it to be true that the average profit of the importer was between 1,600 and 1,800 per cent. What an indictment it would be against him when he said he would not turn over the names of the profiteers to the Department of Justice when he blocked the resolution which was offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] asking for an investigation. What an indictment it would be against him and his party if it were believed that he deliberately, with knowledge that extortion to the extent of 1,600 to 1,800 per cent was being practiced on the farmers of North Dakota, said that he would not move and would not let anybody else move to prosecute the men guilty of that extortion.

Then came the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and repeated the show. Both of the very able Senators, and both very partisan Senators—I do not fall out with them for that—seem to have exhibited these wares and pointed to these prices not to bolster up the tariff bill they sponsor but to indict the great newspapers of the country, particularly the Republican newspapers. They say those newspapers have sold out not only their advertising columns but their editorial columns to advertisers. It meant, if it meant anything, that there was not any longer a single honest metropolitan Republican newspaper in America. The Senator from Indiana went so far as to say, speaking of the New York Times, that one single advertising patron of that paper:

> I quote that only for the purpose of showing the strangle hold the retail and importing establishments of New York have on some of these very great publications and newspapers.

He said further:

> I have as great admiration for the New York Times as a newspaper as anybody else, but it is an international paper. It believes in these importing houses. It is opposed fundamentally to the establishment of American industry if and where such industry interferes with the importing business, and those are the same people who all the time tried to drag us into the League of Nations.

I do not know whether the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Indiana really believe that such newspapers as the New York Tribune, the New York Herald, the Chicago Tribune, the Times, the Post, the World, and a number of other reputable papers, were selling their editorial columns as a means of selling their advertising columns. That is what they said.

The Senator from North Dakota grew a little angry with me because I asked him if he thought that because a paper would sell out for an advertisement it would sell out for money; in other words, if one could ask the editor what the price of an editorial would be and whether he would name the price. He said he was not being tried and therefore would not answer, but he did say over and over again that the papers were controlled. For instance, on page 8710 of the RECORD of June 14 he said:

With every metropolitan paper the mouthpiece of the importer who buys its advertising pages, the very foundation of the temple of protection is being undermined by this insidious propaganda.

Again, he said about the papers:

When, then, do the New York and Boston newspapers attack the tariff bill? Why do they print articles and editorials to deceive the American people?

He charges that they print articles to deceive the American people.

Why do those responsible for the propaganda throw upon the moving-picture screens falsehoods, stating that tariff duties are based on the retail prices, which are from 100 per cent to 15,000 per cent greater than the foreign prices upon which the duties are levied?

In the case of the metropolitan press it is because their lifeblood depends upon the revenue from their big advertisers, and their big advertisers depend for their prosperity upon the cheapness with which they can buy abroad and the high prices they can get in the American market from the American consumer.

There are a number of charges that these papers sell their editorial columns, and what seemed so surprising to the Senator from North Dakota was that they were assailing the very party which they had heretofore supported; in other words, they were such traitors that they would not only sell out but would attack their own friends in their editorial columns because it brought advertising profits.

Those were the two reasons for putting on the show it would seem—first, to make American people think the average spread in import prices was 1,600 or 1,800 per cent; and, second, to lay a foundation to indict the metropolitan press for making the charge that it had sold out.

I do not know whether every Republican who opposes this tariff bill has sold out. I presume, in the mind of the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Indiana, they have. Every Republican who has sought a nomination, however, so far as I know in any of the Central or Northwestern States—I mean every individual seeking a nomination on a Republican ticket—has denounced this tariff bill.

The gentleman just nominated in Iowa for the United States Senate denounced it before he was nominated. Several people who have been selected as candidates for the House of Representatives have denounced it. Many individual Republicans everywhere have denounced it. I presume my mail is not different from that of other Senators, and I get letters every day from some one saying, "I am a Republican, but I am against these rates. They are outrageous. They mean an increased cost to the American consumer, and the manufacturing industry does not need it."

I presume I should infer, if I should follow the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Indiana, that every man of them has been bribed, because they would not concede that the metropolitan papers could be against the bill for any other reason than a corrupt motive; that they had sold out; that the editorial columns had been purchased by the advertisers and were being used to deceive the American public, as the Senator from North Dakota said. If they sold out, then I presume it is fair to presume every individual Republican opposed to the measure has been bought. Every Republican Senator who opposes it has been corrupted. One inference is as fair as the other. The one has not any more common sense in it than the other, and nobody believes either.

But, Mr. President, I merely wish to repeat that if the Republican Party now wants to be candid with the American people, it must admit that the show which has been conducted here—and I understand they are to open in the House next week, because they seem to be playing the circuit—does not represent the legitimate and ordinary spread between the price of imported articles of general consumption and the importers' prices, but if they can affirm that, then they must be consistent and write a tariff bill to protect the American market against such importations and raise their rates to 1,600 per cent. They can not contend, on the one hand, that this is an honest spread of prices, that the importer can make 1,600 to 15,000 per cent; and, on the other hand, that they can keep out the importation of that kind of goods with a tariff duty of 100 per cent. Either the show is intended to deceive the American people and does not represent the correct spread, or else the tariff bill is a farce and will not protect American industry.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to put in the RECORD, in order that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] may see it to-morrow, the statement that during the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] day before yesterday there were 114 interruptions by Democratic Senators, and four of them were made by the Senator from Mississippi himself.

I believe the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has asked unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, on page 48, lines 12 and 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The Chair will inform the Senator from Utah that that vote has been reconsidered, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if there is to be a vote taken, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	McNary	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson	Moses	Stanley
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Sterling
Calder	Kellogg	Nicholson	Swanson
Capper	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Caraway	Keyes	Oddie	Trammell
Culberson	King	Overman	Underwood
Cummins	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	La Follette	Pomerene	Warren
Dial	Lenroot	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	McCormick	Sheppard	Willis
Harris	McCumber	Shortridge
Harrison	McKellar	Simmons
Heflin	McKinley	Smith

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], on account of illness. I request that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

LOWE HAYDEN BIBBY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to report without amendment, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill (S. 3690) for the relief of Lowe Hayden Bibby, and I submit a report (No. 792) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] if he will not permit this bill to be now considered? There will be no discussion of the bill, and it is of such a nature that unless it be passed now I do not think it will do much good.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Mississippi for the consideration of the bill, if there shall be no discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Lowe Hayden Bibby, who graduated from the United States Naval Academy on June 2, 1922, an ensign in the United States Navy, to rank next after Ensign Robert McCormick Peacher: Provided, That such appointment shall be regarded, to all intents and purposes, as having been made upon his graduation from the United States Naval Academy, and as though his resignation which became effective June 2, 1922, had not been accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6110) amending section 97 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. This is a bill permitting the United States court to be held once a year in the city of Schenectady, in the northern district of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill may lead to some discussion, and if it does, then there will be a charge of filibustering made against this side of the Chamber.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the bill shall lead to any discussion, I shall certainly object to its consideration.

Mr. CALDER. If the bill leads to discussion, I shall withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill asked for by the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. There will be no objection, if it leads to no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 97 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and it is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 97. The State of New York is divided into four judicial districts, to be known as the northern, eastern, southern, and western districts of New York. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Albany, Broome, Cayuga, Chenango, Clinton, Cortland, Delaware, Essex, Franklin, Fulton, Hamilton, Herkimer, Jefferson, Lewis, Madison, Montgomery, Oneida, Onondaga, Oswego, Otsego, Rensselaer, St. Lawrence, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Tioga, Tompkins, Warren, and Washington, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Albany on the second Tuesday in February; at Utica on the first Tuesday in December; at Binghamton on the second Tuesday in June; at Auburn on the first Tuesday in October; at Syracuse on the first Tuesday in April; and, in the discretion of the judge of the court, one term annually at such time and place within the counties of Schenectady, Rensselaer, Saratoga, Onondaga, St. Lawrence, Clinton, Jefferson, Oswego, and Franklin, as he may from time to time appoint: Provided, That suitable accommodations for holding court at such appointed place be furnished free of expense to the United States. Such appointment shall be made by notice of at least 20 days, published in a newspaper published at the place where said court is to be held. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Richmond, Kings, Queens, Nassau, and Suffolk, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Brooklyn on the first Wednesday in every month. The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Columbia, Dutchess, Greene, New York, Orange, Putnam, Rockland, Sullivan, Ulster, and Westchester with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at New York City on the first Tuesday in each month. The district courts of the southern and eastern districts shall have concurrent jurisdiction over the waters within the counties of New York, Kings, Queens, Nassau, Richmond, and Suffolk, and over all seizures made and all matters done in such waters; all processes or orders issued within either of said courts or by any judge thereof shall run and be executed in any part of said waters. The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Allegany, Cattaraugus, Chautauqua, Chemung, Erie, Genesee, Livingston, Monroe, Niagara, Ontario, Orleans, Schuyler, Seneca, Steuben, Wayne, Wyoming, and Yates, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for said district shall be held at Elmira on the second Tuesday in January; at Buffalo on the second Tuesdays in March and November; at Rochester on the second Tuesday in May; at Jamestown on the second Tuesday in July; at Lockport on the second Tuesday in October; and at Canandaigua on the second Tuesday in September. The regular sessions of the district court for the western district for the hearing of motions and for proceedings in bankruptcy and the trial of causes in admiralty, shall be held at Buffalo at least two weeks in each month of the year, except August, unless the business is sooner disposed of. The times for holding the same and such other special sessions as the court shall deem necessary shall be fixed by rules of the court. All process in admiralty causes and proceedings shall be made returnable at Buffalo. The judge of any district in the State of New York may perform the duties of the judge of any other district in such State upon the request of any resident judge entered in the minutes of his court; and in such cases such judge shall have the same powers as are vested in the resident judge."
